JAMES BIBBY, LTD. v. WOODS (HOWARD, Garnishee).

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Lynskey, JJ.), May 5, 1949.]

Solicitors—Lien—Charging order—Money payable on compromise of actions—No application for charging order—Garnishee order nisi made in favour of client's judgment creditor—Creditor's right to have order made absolute—Solicitors Act, 1932 (c. 37), s. 69—R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5.

Appeal—Divisional Court—Garnishee order absolute.

By R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5: " Whenever in any proceedings to obtain an attachment of debts it is suggested by the garnishee that the debt sought to be attached belongs to some third person, or that any third person has a lien or charge upon it, the court or a judge may order such third person to appear, and state the nature and particulars of his claim upon such debt."

On Feb. 25, 1949, judgment creditors obtained a garnishee order nisi on a sum of £90 which became payable to the judgment debtor on the compromise of certain actions to which he was a party. On Mar. 4, on the application by the judgment creditors for the garnishee order to be made absolute, the judgment debtor informed the registrar that his solicitor claimed to be entitled to a charge on the garnished debt for his costs. The solicitor knew of the garnishee order nisi on Feb. 28, but he had not applied to the court to obtain a charging order under the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 69. The registrar made the garnishee order absolute without ordering an inquiry under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5. On an appeal by the judgment debtor to the Divisional Court:

HELD: a solicitor had a lien only on property which was in his possession, and, where a sum of money was recovered through his professional exertions, he did not have a charge on the money for his costs, but he merely had a right to apply to the court for such a charge: Mercer v. Graves (1872) (L.R. 7 K.B. 499; 26 L.T. 551), followed. As, therefore, the solicitor had not applied for a charging order before the application for the garnishee order to be made absolute, he was not entitled to an inquiry under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5, and the judgment creditors were entitled to have the order made absolute.

Shippey v. Grey (1880) (42 L.T. 673), distinguished.

Per curiam: the judgment debtor was not adversely affected by the garnishee order absolute and it was doubtful whether he had any right to be heard on the appeal.

Held, further: An appeal from a garnishee order absolute lies to the Divisional Court under R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 22A, and not to a judge in chambers under R.S.C., Ord. 35, r. 9.

Appeal by the judgment debtor from an order of Mr. Registrar Benjamin, made at the Liverpool District Registry, on Mar. 4, 1949.

At the hearing of an application for a garnishee order to be made absolute, the judgment debtor informed the registrar that his solicitor claimed to be entitled to a charge on the sum in question in respect of his costs. No charging order had, however, been made under the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 69, and the registrar made the garnishee order absolute without directing an inquiry under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5. The Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal from the registrar's order. The facts appear in the judgment of Lord Goddard, C.J.

Craine for the judgment debtor.

The judgment creditors did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal from a garnishee order absolute made by the learned district registrar at Liverpool. The facts were that James Bibby, Ltd., the judgment creditors, had obtained a judgment against Woods, the judgment debtor, who had previously been in partnership with one Howard. Differences had arisen between Woods and Howard, and actions had been begun, by one of them in the Court of Passage and by the other in the county court at Liverpool. The parties then negotiated, and the two actions were compromised on the terms that Howard should pay to Woods a sum of £90. The judgment creditors then obtained a garnishee order nisi on Feb. 25, 1949.

A garnishee order nisi, as everyone knows, merely holds matters in suspense with regard to the debt. The money cannot be dealt with, but the order does not decide who is entitled to it. That has to be decided on the application to make the garnishee order absolute. When the application for the absolute order was made, counsel for the judgment debtor informed the court that the solicitor instructing him on behalf of the judgment debtor claimed that he was entitled to a charge on the debt for his costs. The registrar made the garnishee order absolute, and it is contended here that he ought not to have done so, but should have ordered an inquiry by reason of R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5, which states:

> "Whenever in any proceedings to obtain an attachment of debts it is suggested by the garnishee that the debt sought to be attached belongs to some third person, or that any third person has a lien or charge upon it, the court or a judge may order such third person to appear, and state the nature and particulars of his claim upon such debt."

It is true, as counsel for the judgment debtor argued, that, if it comes to the knowledge of, or is suggested to, the court, when asked to make a garnishee order absolute, that the money does not, in fact, belong to the garnishee, but belongs to some one else, the court ought to order that third person to come in and make a claim. A sort of interpleader proceeding is to take place to decide who has the right to the money. In Roberts v. Death (1) it was suggested that the money was trust money, and not really the money of the judgment debtor. Trust money cannot, of course, be used to satisfy the judgment creditor's debt, because in equity the money does not belong to the trustee—it is the property

A of the cestui que trust. In this case the district registrar did not make an order for an inquiry, and, for reasons which I will give in a moment, I think he was right in not doing so.

This is alleged to be an appeal by the judgment debtor. In truth, it is not an appeal by the judgment debtor at all, but is an appeal by his solicitor who claims that he is entitled to a charge on the money. The court has had very
B great doubt whether or not counsel has any right to be heard on this appeal as representing the judgment debtor, and, so far as the judgment debtor is concerned, I do not understand how he is affected by the order. He has a sum of money due to him which either he must pay to his solicitor for costs, or, if he does not pay it to the solicitor, he must pay it to the judgment creditors. If he pays it to the solicitor, he still owes the judgment creditors the money,
C and, if he pays it to the judgment creditors, he still owes the solicitor the money. The solicitor is no party to these proceedings, and, although we have allowed the matter to go on and to be argued, it seems to me to be extremely doubtful whether we really had any right to hear the judgment debtor at all on this matter.

The only ground on which the district registrar could have ordered the issue
D to be tried, or the solicitor to come in and state the nature of his claim, was if it was proved or suggested to the district registrar that the solicitor had a lien or charge on the money. It is said here that the solicitor had a lien or charge on the money, because [under the Solicitors Act, 1932, s. 69] he had a right to apply to the court for a charging order, but he had not done so. The fallacy that underlies the argument which has been addressed to us is that it is not
E appreciated what is a solicitor's lien on a sum of money which is recovered by his exertions. I will assume in this case that, if the solicitor had applied for a charging order to the appropriate court, which would have been either the Court of Passage or the Liverpool County Court, and possibly both, he might have obtained a charging order, but he did not do so. Until he obtained a charging order, he had, at the most, only an inchoate right, i.e., he had not got F a lien on the money, but he had a right to apply for a lien. This is made perfectly clear when the nature of the lien is understood. A lien in the ordinary strict sense can only exist where the person claiming the lien has the property in his possession. The common lien is the artificer's lien to hold property on which he has spent time, labour and trouble in making repairs, and it exists because he has the property in his possession and can refuse to give it up until
G he is paid. Questions of lien have often arisen, e.g., in the case of livery stable keepers, and the courts have refused to allow a claim for lien because it has been held that the very nature of the contract was that the horse should be allowed to go out whenever its owner required it, and, therefore, the livery stable keeper had no right to a lien, as a lien could only exist on those things which were in one's possession and which one had a right to keep.

H A solicitor's lien is of two-fold character. He has a lien on the papers of his clients which are in his possession, and he can refuse to give up those papers so long as his costs are not paid. With regard to a sum of money which comes into existence owing to his professional exertions, the term " lien " is really a misnomer. Although it is always referred to as a lien, it is not strictly and accurately a lien, because it has not got the characteristics of a lien. That was made clear by the judgment of COCKBURN, C.J., in Mercer v. Graves (2), where, speaking of the solicitor's lien, he said (L.R. 7 Q.B. 503) :

> ". . . there is no such thing as a lien except upon something of which you have possession . . . although we talk of an attorney having a lien upon a judgment, it is in fact only a claim or right to ask for the intervention of the court for his protection, when, having obtained judgment for his client, he finds there is a probability of the client depriving him of his costs."

That passage was cited by Lord Merrivale, P. ([1933] P. 205) in Mason v. Mason and Cottrell (3), which went to the Court of Appeal, where Lord Hanworth, M.R., referring to Mercer v. Graves (2) said ([1933] P. 214) :

> " The nature of a solicitor's lien is pointed out in the course of that case. It is merely a right to claim the equitable interference of the court, who may order that the judgment obtained by the solicitor's client do stand as security for her costs and that payment of such an amount as will cover them be made to the solicitor in the first instance. That lien is one which prevails over a fund which is in sight ; the right is one which, so to speak, cannot prevail at large."

That shows what the nature of the lien is. It is a right to go to the court and ask the court to charge the property in favour of the solicitor, and, until that is done, the solicitor has no right to the money.

In the present case, when the summons was before the district registrar, no charging order had been made or applied for. Therefore, there was at that time no lien or charge on the money. There certainly was no lien on it in the strict sense of the term, and there was no charge on it because the charge had not been applied for. Counsel for the judgment debtor has referred us to a considerable number of cases. The one nearest in point is Shippey v. Grey (4), but, when the facts of that case are understood, it is no authority for the present application. In that case the plaintiffs were the solicitors for W. in an action in which he recovered a sum of money, and the defendant was a judgment creditor of W. who had obtained ex parte, on the day that judgment was signed in the action, a garnishee order attaching all debts due to W. On the taxation of costs on the same day, the plaintiffs for the first time learned of the defendant's claim, and then gave notice, to the defendant in the action in which W. was plaintiff, of their claim in lien, and within five days applied for an order declaring that they were entitled to a charge on the money recovered by W. It was held, affirming the decision of the Common Pleas Division, that the plaintiffs had a lien for their costs on the sum recovered by W., that they were entitled to the order sought for, and that the garnishee order obtained by the defendant did not take priority over that lien. In that case, the Court of Appeal held that the solicitor had been wrongfully refused the charging order for which he had applied, and, therefore, as the charging order should have been made, the solicitor was to be in the same position for all purposes as if it had been made. He could not be defeated because the court did not make the order which it ought to have made. In the present case, however, there was no charge in existence when the case came before the learned registrar, and, therefore, the judgment creditors were entitled to have the garnishee order made absolute. That is one form of execution, and it not infrequently happens that where there are or may be several claims against money the person who gets in first gets the fruits of his diligence. It is said that the solicitor could not have applied for a charging order as he did not know until Feb. 28 that the garnishee order nisi had been made. If, however, he had then gone to the court and asked for a charging order, he might have obtained it. Had he obtained it, his charge would have taken precedence over the judgment creditor's claim. As, however, no charging order had been made, the so-called lien had not been perfected, and, therefore, I think that the learned district registrar was perfectly right. This appeal fails, and is dismissed.

BIRKETT, J. : I agree.

LYNSKEY, J. : I agree. It seems to me that the solicitor has not taken the correct proceedings to protect his own right. As my Lord has pointed out, a solicitor's lien on money which is not in his own possession but has come into existence owing to his professional exertions is not strictly a lien at all, but is merely a right to go to the court and ask the court to charge the money for the amount of the costs. No such application had been made in this case, and the judgment debtor is now claiming that he is affected adversely by the judgment on the garnishee proceedings. Personally, I cannot see that he is adversely affected in any way. It seems to me that he really has no right to be heard in this court on this appeal. After the solicitor had heard about the garnishee order nisi on Feb. 28, his proper course would have been to apply for a charging order. If he had got his charging order before the garnishee order nisi was made absolute and had brought the charging order to the attention of the registrar, there would have been a dispute as to the facts and the registrar would have been bound to direct an inquiry under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 5. In my view, the learned district registrar did the only thing competent to him in the circumstances, having regard to the terms of the rule. I agree with my Lord that this appeal must be dismissed.

Craine (for the judgment debtor) : My Lords, may I now refer you to an order which was made by BIRKETT, J., on Mar. 15, 1949. This appeal was originally brought to BIRKETT, J., in chambers under R.S.C., Ord. 35, r. 9, and he held that he had no jurisdiction to deal with it under that rule and that the appeal should have been to a Divisional Court under R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 22A. He dismissed the appeal, but reserved the costs, making this order :

> " It is ordered that the said appeal be dismissed and time for appealing to the Divisional Court be extended to Apr. 5, 1949. And it is further ordered that the costs of this application be reserved if the appeal be prosecuted but that otherwise such costs be taxed and paid by the judgment debtor to the judgment creditors."

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The judgment creditors attended before the learned judge in chambers ?

Craine : Yes, my Lord.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : There should be no costs on the order before BIRKETT, J. What happened in this case has happened on more than one occasion, viz., that, where garnishee orders have been finally made, an appeal is very often taken to the judge in chambers. That is wrong. R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 22A, provides for the appeal to come to the Divisional Court. It is well for practitioners to remember that the appeal in these garnishee matters lies to the Divisional Court and not to the judge in chambers.

Appeal dismissed. No order as to costs.

Charitable Purpose—" To strengthen bonds between Union of South Africa and mother country and incidentally conduce to appeasement of racial feeling in South Africa."

A testator by his will directed his trustees to apply part of his estate " to a fund for any purpose which in their opinion is designed to strengthen the bonds of unity between the Union of South Africa and the mother country, and which incidentally will conduce to the appeasement of racial feeling between the Dutch and English speaking sections of the South African community."

Held : (i) although undoubtedly of benefit to the community, the purpose expressed in the disposition was not charitable in the sense of the preamble to the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4, because it could be achieved by many methods which would not involve charitable benefits, such as the support of a political party or a newspaper. The terms of the disposition comprehended purposes that were not charitable, and, in particular, " the appeasement of racial feeling " was a political cause which did not have as its dominant motive the desire to profit people who would not otherwise be profited, and which was not, therefore, charitable.

Dictum of Lord Haldane in A.-G. v. National Provincial Bank ([1924] A.C. 267), applied.

(ii) even if there were a principle that general words that money was to be applied for the benefit of a district or a country were construed as meaning for such purposes as were recognised by the law as charitable purposes, the principle had no application in this case where the purpose was expressed.

APPEAL by the Attorney-General from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated Oct. 29, 1947, reported [1947] 2 All E.R. 607.

B trustees were directed to apply a fund for any purpose which was designed to strengthen the bonds of unity between the Union of South Africa and the mother country and which incidentally conduced to the appeasement of racial feeling in South Africa was not charitable. The Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision. The Government of the Union of South Africa intervened in the appeal by leave. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

D of the Union of South Africa.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16. LORD GREENE, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. The gift which we have to construe is in the following terms :

> " I direct that the trust fund and the income thereof or such part or parts
> E thereof respectively as shall not have been paid or applied under the trusts affecting the same shall be held upon trust to be applied by my trustees to a ' fund ' for any purpose which in their opinion is designed to strengthen the bonds of unity between the Union of South Africa and the mother country and which incidentally will conduce to the appeasement of racial feeling between the Dutch and English speaking sections
> F of the South African community."

ROXBURGH, J., held that it was not a good charitable gift. Before us, further evidence was produced consisting of an affidavit by Field Marshal Smuts. We have given this affidavit most careful consideration, but we are unable to regard it as affording a reason for coming to a conclusion different from that at which ROXBURGH, J., arrived. We realise the truth of the contention
G that the objects to which the gift is to be devoted are matters of great public concern both in the Union of South Africa and in the mother country. In particular, the appeasement of racial feeling in the Union cannot but benefit all inhabitants of the Union, not merely the members of the two sections of the community expressly referred to, but the very wide and vague scope of the gift and the unrestricted latitude of application which its language permits
H make it impossible, in our opinion, to find that it falls within the spirit and intendment of the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4). We are quite prepared to accept the views expressed by the Field Marshal as to the most effective and satisfactory methods of achieving the objects of the testator, but the question is not what persons of sound judgment would consider to be the best manner of application. It is how, on the true construction of the gift, it would be permissible to apply the trust funds. In answering this question it is, we think, impossible to limit the permissible methods of application on the lines indicated in the affidavit. The argument of the Attorney-General—and, in particular, the contention of counsel for the Government of the Union of South Africa (which we will deal with more fully hereafter) that anything which contributes to the " common stock " of a community is charitable—in our view amount to no more than a re-statement in different language of the oft-rejected argument that what is for the benefit of the public is ipso facto charitable within LORD MACNAGHTEN'S fourth class in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (1). We may observe that, if this gift were to be held to be charitable, it would mean that any gift in favour of " charity " generally (i.e., without any specific direction as to its application) could lawfully be applied (e.g., under a scheme) to the objects here stated. This would, in our view, amount to an extension of the ambit of charity for which the law relating to charities, full as it is of anomalies, affords no warrant either in principle or in authority. With these general observations we will proceed to state more fully the reasons which have led us to our conclusion.

As ROXBURGH, J., read them, the terms of the disposition comprehend any application which, in the opinion of the testator's trustees, is calculated to promote or subserve what is in truth a political cause or aspiration, viz., that of closer collaboration or relations between two national groups, those of the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa, and at the same time closer collaboration or relations between those of English and Dutch descent within the confines of one of those national groups, viz., South Africa. We do not think the case is altered if it be assumed in favour of the Attorney-General that the unlimited discretion given to the trustees extends only to the first limb of the objective and not to the second. For in that case the result is that (as counsel for the several next of kin put it) the drawing together of the two divergent races in South Africa (which on this hypothesis is made a condition of any application of the fund) is a part or incident of the broader aim of drawing together two communities which form part of the political organisation of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and that which is made the condition is still what we have called a political cause or aspiration.

In Williams Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), the House of Lords has laid down very clearly that in order to come within LORD MACNAGHTEN'S fourth class the gift must be not only for the benefit of the community but beneficial in a way which the law regards as charitable. In order to satisfy the latter it must be within the " spirit and intendment " of the preamble of the statute of Elizabeth. That preamble set out what were then regarded as purposes which should be treated as charitable in law. It is obvious that as time passed and conditions changed common opinion as to what was properly covered by the word charitable also changed. This has been recognised by the courts as the most cursory examination of the cases shows. In order to be within the spirit and intendment of the preamble we take it that one must find something charitable in the same sense as the recited purposes are charitable. LORD MACNAGHTEN'S fourth class is represented in the preamble by the repair of bridges, etc., and possibly by the maintenance of houses of correction. This negatives any suggestion that " charitable " must be confined to the poor: Verge v. Somerville (3) [1924] A.C. 502. We have come to the conclusion that, though undoubtedly of benefit to the community, the purpose under consideration is not " charitable " in the sense in which the benefits to the community instanced in the preamble are charitable. The benefit, as we understand it, does not have to be in any way ejusdem generis with the recited purposes, but it has to be charitable in the same sense. In A.-G. v. National Provincial Bank (4), LORD HALDANE, in considering whether patriotic purposes were charitable, says ([1924] A.C. 267):

> " In the case of a gift for charitable purposes there is a desire to profit people who would not be profited without your gift—that is the dominant > motive. In the case of patriotism there is a desire to fulfil one dominant purpose, that is to benefit the cause of the country to which you belong."

We think " the appeasement of racial feeling " is within the class of " cause " which LORD HALDANE was distinguishing from charity.

Field Marshal Smuts (than whom no one can speak with greater authority on this subject) expresses a strong opinion that the proper method for the appeasement of racial feeling is education in its widest sense—" students' education, journalistic training, interchange of young men and women between Britain and South Africa and between young South Africans of different racial origin." It is unfortunate if, as may well be, these methods were in the testator's mind he did not seek to constitute a trust which might well have been valid as an educational trust notwithstanding that the education had the ultimate aim as set out in the will. We, however, find it impossible to construe this trust as one confined to educational purposes. These may be the best methods, but they are certainly not the only methods. The problem of appeasing racial feeling within the community is a political problem, perhaps primarily political. One method conducive to its solution might well be to support a political party or a newspaper which had such appeasement most at heart. This argument gains force in the present case from the other political object, namely, the strengthening of the bonds of unity between the Union and the mother country. It would also we think be easy to think of arrangements for mutual hospitality which would be conducive to the purposes set out but would not be charitable. We may mention that the words do not, at any rate to us, suggest the support or promotion of legislation. What we have said in this paragraph we think supports the view which we related to LORD HALDANE's observation in the National Provincial Bank case (4) and also would make the trust invalid because the words used themselves cover, and, indeed, suggest, modes of expenditure which would plainly not be charitable. If the object and the means indicated are clearly charitable, then the court is not astute to look for possible, but subsidiary, non-charitable means which might be within the words used : Re Hood (5) and National Anti-Vivisection Society v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6). The non-charitable purposes to which we have referred cannot, we think, be disregarded as merely subsidiary and possible modes of achieving the stated purpose, whatever may have been in the testator's mind.

That disposes of the case, but as the Attorney-General relied very strongly on Re Smith (7) we will give our reasons for thinking that that case and the line of cases referred to in it do not lay down the principle which it was sought to extract from them. Counsel for the Government of the Union of South Africa, who developed this part of the argument, submitted that these cases showed that anything which contributed to increase the " common stock "—to use his expression—of a community was charitable. It was held in Re Smith (7) that a gift " unto my country England—for own use and benefit absolutely " was a valid gift. The cases which are reviewed and relied on go back to West v. Knight (8) in 1669. It was decided in that case that a gift by a testator to the parish of Great Creaton, where he was born, without saying to what use, was good. There are two possible views of these cases. In TUDOR ON CHARITIES, 5th ed., p. 45, the view appears to be taken that under such a gift as that to Great Creaton the trustees could expend the money on " public or benevolent " purposes which, if expressly referred to, would have voided the gift. The other view is that where general words are used such as to benefit such and such a parish or " my country," the law will construe these words as restricted to benefits which are charitable in law. We are not suggesting that there may not be cases or statements made in cases which appear to justify the statement in TUDOR, but the cases referred to and relied on in Re Smith (7) seem to us to proceed on the basis of what we have called the second view. In West v. Knight (8), the master was directed to see that the money was disposed of for the benefit of the poor of the parish. In A.-G. v. Lonsdale (Earl) (9) Leach, V.-C., in the passage cited in Re Smith (7) ([1932] 1 Ch. 159), construed the words " conducing to the good of the county of Westmorland " as meaning charitable purposes. The master was directed to settle a scheme under which the money was to be applied for some charitable purpose or purposes. A.-G. v. Carlisle Corpn. (10) is a complicated case dealing with a special subject-matter and we doubt if it assists on the point under consideration. In Mitford v. Reynolds (11) an objection was based on a provision of the trust that the Governor-General and the inhabitants of Dacca had to agree on the application of the money. It was said: What are you to do if they differ ? Lord Lyndhurst, L.C., in dealing with this objection, used these words (1 Ph. 195) :

> " I think the answer is obvious. You could not apply the fund to any charitable object until they agreed, or until the court, if the court thought itself justified in doing so, should interfere for that purpose. But the same difficulty would exist in a great variety of cases. If property is given for a charitable object to A. and B., to be applied to such charitable institutions in this metropolis as they shall agree upon, they may differ ; but such a bequest was never considered on that account as not constituting a valid bequest."

From these words and a study of the whole judgment, it is clear to us that the purposes had to be charitable purposes. In Nightingale v. Goulbourn (12), Wigram, V.-C., at the beginning of his judgment states and comments on the argument for the next of kin in these words. He says (5 Hare 487) :

> " The argument for the next of kin was, that the words of the bequest are so general as to admit of the application of the property by the trustee to purposes not charitable, within the construction of that term adopted in the decided cases. If it can be shown that the trustee could have such a power as that which it is suggested on the part of the next of kin that he would have, the case is at an end . . ."

The learned Vice-Chancellor regarded the case as open to doubt, but in holding that the bequest was valid he clearly construed it as covering only charitable purposes according to the decided cases. There are other citations in Re Smith (7) which point in the same direction, for example, that from Lord Eldon ([1932] 1 Ch. 169).

If we are right in holding that the principle laid down is that general words that money is to be applied for the benefit of a district or a country are construed as meaning for such purposes as are recognised by the law as charitable purposes, the principle has no application here where the purpose is expressed. Lord Simonds, in his speech ([1947] 1 All E.R. 521) in Williams Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), referred shortly to this class of case and cited the passage we have referred to from Tudor on Charities. After referring to the difficulty he said : " But I would suggest that it is possible to justify as charitable a gift ' to my country England ' on the ground that, where no purpose is defined, a charitable purpose is implicit in the context." In the case to which we have referred, this was, we think, the basis of the decisions, and there is, therefore, no inconsistency between these cases and the law as stated in Williams Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). The appeal must be dismissed. Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re WILLIAMS' WILL TRUSTS. REES v. WILLIAMS AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), April 26, 27, 1949.]

Will—"If any daughter of mine shall die without lawful issue her surviving" her share to devolve on other children—Whether death at any time would cause divesting.

By his will a testator devised and bequeathed all his property to his trustees on trust to pay his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and subject thereto to hold for his wife for her life. Thereafter the testator devised certain realty on trust for his son D., and other realty on trust for his daughter M. His interest and shares in certain colliery undertakings he gave equally to his four children D., M.J., E., and M. in equal shares, and all the residue of his estate, subject to the setting aside of £3,000 which was to be held on certain trusts for his son H. and H.'s widow and issue, he gave on trust for his two daughters M.J. and E. equally. The will continued: "I declare that if any child of mine shall predecease me leaving lawful issue such issue shall take and if more than one equally amongst them the share which such child of mine so dying would have taken had he or she survived me. I declare that if any daughter of mine shall die without lawful issue her surviving her share shall thereupon devolve upon my other children then surviving and the issue of such as may be then dead in equal shares per stirpes." The testator's wife survived the testator and died on Mar. 22, 1947.

HELD: on the true construction of the will the second declaration divesting a daughter's interest would have effect if the daughter should die at any time and was not limited to the event of her death during the lifetime of the tenant for life.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether on the true construction of a will a clause divesting a daughter's interest (to which she became entitled on the death of the widow of the testator) if she should "die without lawful issue her surviving" would have effect on the daughter's death at any time, or whether its effect was limited to the death of the daughter during the lifetime of the tenant for life. ROXBURGH, J., held that it would have the former effect. The facts appear in the judgment.

Hubert A. Rose for the plaintiff, a daughter of the testator.

Richmount for the first defendant, the surviving executor and trustee of the will.

Lazarus for the second defendant, a son of the testator.

M. J. Albery for the third defendant, a daughter of the testator.

Mervyn Davies for the fourth defendant, a granddaughter.

ROXBURGH, J.: By his will the testator gave, devised and bequeathed all his property to his trustees

> "Upon trust thereout to pay my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and subject thereto upon trust for my said wife Margaret Williams for her life if she shall so long continue my widow and from and after her decease or re-marriage whichever shall first happen upon the following trusts namely As to the freehold dwelling-house called The Park wherein I now reside and the ground held therewith and also my one-fourth share of and in the freehold farm called Poundfold Farm situate at Three Crosses upon trust for my son Daniel Williams. And as to my freehold hereditaments known as Bryncam situate in the parish of Bettws in the county of Carmarthen upon trust for my daughter Margaretta Williams And as to all my share and interest in the undertaking known as the Berthllwyd Colliery or all my shares therein in case the same shall have been converted into a limited company before my decease and all my shares in the Cefngolau Collieries Ltd. upon trust for my children Daniel Williams, Mary Jane Williams, Elinor Rees and Margaretta Williams in equal shares as tenants in common and as to all the residue of my estate both real and personal upon trust to set apart the sum of £3,000 upon the trusts hereinafter declared in favour of my son Alfred David Williams and his widow and issue if any and subject thereto upon trust for my two daughters Mary Jane Williams and Elinor Rees in equal shares as tenants in common I declare that if any child of mine shall predecease me leaving lawful issue such issue shall take and if more than one equally amongst them the share which such child of mine so dying would have taken had he or she survived me. I declare that if any daughter of mine shall die without lawful issue her surviving her share shall thereupon devolve upon my other children then surviving and the issue of such as may be then dead in equal shares per stirpes."

The testator's wife survived him and died on Mar. 22, 1947, without having re-married. The question is whether in that second declaration which I last read the words "shall die without lawful issue her surviving" refer to the death of the daughter at any time or are limited to the death of the daughter during the lifetime of the tenant for life.

The law on this question is in no doubt, but the difficulty, as usual, lies in its proper application. The law is stated by STIRLING, L.J., in Re Schnadhorst (1) in the Court of Appeal. He said ([1902] 2 Ch. 239):

> "Adopting the words of LORD CAIRNS, L.C., in O'Mahoney v. Burdett (2) (L.R. 7 H.L. 398) I say that the gift over should be read according to its natural and proper meaning—that is, as meaning death at any time; and that this original and literal meaning ought not to be departed from unless the context renders it necessary or proper to do so. That being so, we have to see what sort of context would render that necessary or proper. In O'Mahoney v. Burdett (2), LORD SELBORNE pointed out two classes of cases in which such a context is found: one is where there is an express direction that the distribution is to take place at a particular time; and the other class of cases is where there is an indication on the face of the will that the legatee is to take in a certain event an absolute interest."

STIRLING, L.J., continues (ibid., 241):

> "In my opinion, the present case does not fall within either of the two classes of cases LORD SELBORNE mentions; but those two classes are not exhaustive: there may be others. In every case there may be a question what the context is, and the court has to give effect to the language of the will."

It is clear that here there is not an express direction that distribution is to take place at any particular time, but I have the authority of SARGANT, J., in Re Roberts (3) for saying that such an express direction is not essential. In considering, however, the actual words which are to be found in the will, I have received great assistance from STIRLING, L.J.'s discussion in Re Schnadhorst (1) of the particular language in that will. According to the headnote the language there was :

> " . . . upon trust for his widow for life or widowhood, and after her A decease or second marriage to apply the income for the maintenance and education of his children until the youngest who should be living being a son should attain 21, or being a daughter should attain that age or marry. Subject thereto he directed that the trust fund and the income thereof, and any accumulations not vested or applied under his will, should be held in trust for all his children who being sons should attain 21, or being B daughters should attain that age or marry, to whom he gave his residuary estate in equal shares. And he directed that if any of his children should die leaving issue, such issue should take his or her deceased parent's share equally as tenants in common."

With regard to that will, STIRLING, L.J., said (ibid., 240) :

> C " There are two points that have been relied upon in argument. In the first place, it is said that the direction for the application of the income lasts only until the youngest child attains 21, and that when that child attains 21, there being no direction as to the application of the income after that, the trustees are to pay the trust fund to the children who have become entitled. The other contention is that the words ' to whom I give D and bequeath my residuary real and personal estate in equal shares ' give the children an absolute interest. I cannot see in either of these circumstances any expression or indication of the testator's meaning that after the death of the widow and on the youngest child attaining 21 there is to be a distribution. The testator does not say so in express terms : so far as the language goes it has a contrary meaning. The fund is not to E pass away from the hands of the trustees, but to continue to be held by them. The testator has given his trustees a direction to pay the whole income for the maintenance of the children until the youngest attains 21, or being a daughter marries. When the youngest child attains 21, then that trust comes to an end. But there is no express direction for payment or distribution, and the income will follow the ordinary course F of law, namely, that a child who takes a vested interest liable to be divested in a certain event takes the benefit of the income until the event occurs. I cannot attribute any further meaning to the words ' to whom I give and bequeath my residuary real and personal estate in equal shares.' They do not amount to a direction to divide the property at any particular period : still less do they amount to an indication of intention on the G part of the testator that in any particular event the objects of his bounty were to take absolute interests."

I turn now to the will that is before me. The first consideration which I must bear in mind is that I must read the will as a whole, and that warning to myself is particularly necessary in the present case because the indications favourable to the plaintiff all occur in the earlier parts of the will and those H against the plaintiff in the later parts of the will. It is undoubtedly true that, if I read the dispositions contained in the will, but omit the two declarations, I shall be inclined to conclude that the testator did contemplate a distribution on the death of the tenant for life not only of the sons' shares but also of the daughters' shares, but, if I so read the will, I should be disregarding its express language, which, so far from directing me to do anything of that kind, tells me that from and after the decease of the tenant for life the property is to be held upon the following trusts, and those trusts incorporate and include the two declarations. If I read the whole of it, it seems to me that the testator is plainly making some differentiation between daughters' shares and sons' shares, and the nature of the differentiation is to be found in the second declaration. The second declaration is quite unambiguous in itself, and, reading the trusts together, so far from finding an intention to distribute the daughters' shares on the death of the tenant for life, I find a declared intention that the daughters shall not be mistresses of their own shares if they should die without lawful issue. It is, of course, quite common to make provision for the retention of the daughters' shares during their respective lives. Therefore, there is nothing strange in this provision except to the extent—and this point counsel for the plaintiff has made very forcibly—that it is curious that the declaration would operate to defeat a daughter's interest, even if she had issue who attained 21, if that issue failed to survive her. That is certainly curious, but it is not, in my judgment, a sufficient ground to enable me to say that the words do not mean what they say. There are other difficulties in the way of departing from the literal meaning of the second declaration. It is immediately preceded by the first declaration, which expressly refers to a child who should predecease the testator. If, as counsel for the plaintiff submits, he intended in the second declaration to refer to a daughter who should predecease the tenant for life, it is strange indeed that he should not have said so.

There is another difficulty which arises from the use of the word "then" in the second declaration. In Olivant v. Wright (4) the Court of Appeal was able, in quite a different context, to assign the word "then" to the death of the tenant for life and not to the death of the child and by that means escaped from the difficulties arising from the use of the word "then," but no such course is open to me. The word "then" in the context which I have before me must refer to the time of the death of the child, and not to the time of the death of the tenant for life. Accordingly, I am left with the problem of disposing adequately of the word "then" if the declaration does not mean what it says.

I now look back at the judgment of Stirling, L.J., in Re Schnadhorst (1). Can I say that the dispositions of this will amount to a direction to divide the property at any particular period? I think not. Can I say that they amount to an indication of intention on the part of the testator that in any particular event the objects of his bounty were to take absolute interests? So far as the daughters are concerned, I think not. Can I say that the context renders it necessary or proper for me to depart from the original and literal meaning of the second declaration? I think not. What then must I do? I must say that the second declaration should be read according to its natural and proper meaning, that is to say, as meaning death at any time.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

HONIG v. REDFERN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Lynskey, JJ.), May 11, 1949.]

Alien—Lodger—Registration—Signed statement of alien—All rooms in house let to tenants—Premises not managed by or on behalf of owner—Premises visited only for rent collecting—Aliens Order, 1920 (S.R. & O., 1920, No. 448), art. 7 (1), (2) (as amended by the Aliens (No. 2) Order, 1945 (S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1535)).

The appellant owned a house of which the ground floor was let by him to a seaman's club, and all the other rooms were let to various residents at rents from 15*s.* to 30*s.* a week. Each resident had exclusive use of his rooms and held the keys thereof, and the only parts used in common were the staircases and toilets which the residents cleaned in turn. The appellant did not live on the premises and employed no one to manage them for him. He visited the premises once a week to collect rent and did not otherwise supervise them. Certain aliens were among the residents, but the appellant kept no register of the residents and did not keep a signed statement of the aliens. He was charged under the Aliens Order, 1920, art. 7 (2), (as amended by the Aliens (No. 2) Order, 1945), with failing to keep a register, and also, under art. 7 (1) of the Order (as amended), with failing to keep a signed statement in the prescribed form of every alien lodger.

HELD : art. 7 (1) and (2) of the Order of 1920 (as amended) applied only to lodgers and not to tenants ; the appellant had demised the whole of the premises to tenants, and did not himself manage the premises as a lodging house nor were they so managed by a servant on his behalf ; and, therefore, the residents were not lodgers and the charges should be dismissed.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

The appellant, Emanuel Honig, was charged before a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Thames Magistrate's Court under the Aliens Order, 1920, art. 7 (1) and (2) (as amended by the Aliens (No. 2) Order, 1945), with having failed to keep a register of all lodgers over the age of sixteen years at No. 37, Pennyfields, Limehouse, London, E.14, and with having failed to keep a signed statement in the prescribed form of every alien lodger over the age of sixteen years. The magistrate found the charges proved, and convicted the appellant, imposing a fine of £50 with the alternative of three months' imprisonment on each information. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

M. Waters for the appellant.

Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate before whom the appellant was charged with "failing to keep a register of all lodgers (irrespective of their nationality) over the age of sixteen years contrary to art. 7 (2) of the Aliens Order, 1920 (S.R. & O. 1920, No. 448) as amended by the Aliens (No. 2) Order, 1945 (S.R. & O. 1945, No. 1535)."

A second information was preferred against him for "failing to keep a signed statement in the prescribed form of every alien lodger over the age of sixteen years" contrary to art. 7 (1) of the Order of 1920, as amended by the Order of 1945. The learned magistrate found:

> "(i) That the appellant was at all material times the owner of 37, Pennyfields, in the county of London. (ii) That the ground floor of the said premises was let by the appellant to, and was occupied by, a seaman's club. (iii) That the six rooms on the first and second floors were let by the appellant furnished to a number of tenants in separate lettings at rents which ranged from 15*s*. per week to 30*s*. per week. (iv) That each of the said tenants had exclusive possession of his own rooms and separate locks on his doors. (v) That the said tenants used the toilets in the said premises and the staircases, but no other parts, in common with one another. (vi) That the said tenants took it in turns to clean the said toilets and staircases. (vii) That the appellant did not reside on the said premises nor did he employ anyone on his behalf to manage the said premises. (viii) That the appellant visited the premises once a week for the purpose of collecting rent."

The magistrate also found "that the appellant did not undertake the duty of cleaning the staircases or toilets in the said premises or otherwise supervise the said premises except as aforesaid." Then he found that a British-born woman, who had married a Chinese, and, therefore, was an alien, "was a tenant of two rooms on the first floor of the said premises and that she had keys to her said rooms and a rent book, which keys and book she produced before me," and her husband was residing on the premises and that no register was kept. The appellant was not in possession of a signed statement by the Chinese in accordance with art. 7 (1) of the Aliens Order, 1920 (as amended).

Article 7 of the Aliens Order, 1920, as amended by the Order of 1945, provides:

> "(1) Every alien of the age of sixteen years or over staying at any premises to which this article applies shall at such times as may be prescribed furnish to the keeper of the premises a signed statement in such form and containing such particulars as may be prescribed, and it shall be the duty of the keeper of the premises to require every such alien to comply with his obligations under this paragraph. (2) It shall be the duty of the keeper of any premises to which this article applies to keep a register relating to all persons (irrespective of their nationality) of the age of sixteen years or over staying at the premises . . . (b) it shall be the duty of the keeper of the premises to require every such person to comply with his obligations under this paragraph. (3) The keeper of any premises to which this article applies shall preserve any statement furnished and register kept thereunder relating to persons staying at the premises . . . (4) The premises to which this article applies are any premises, whether furnished or unfurnished, where lodging or sleeping accommodation is provided for reward; and in this article the expression 'stay' means to lodge or sleep, for one night or more, in accommodation so provided."

Therefore, there must be premises in which lodging or sleeping accommodation is provided for reward and there must be a person who is the keeper of those premises. Article 20 (2) of the Order provides:

> "The expression 'keeper' where used in relation to premises where accommodation is provided for reward includes any person who for reward receives any other person to lodge in the premises, either on his own behalf or as manager or otherwise on behalf of any other person."

On the facts found by the learned magistrate it seems clear that there was a demise of all the rooms in the house to different tenants. In those circumstances it is difficult to see how lodging or sleeping accommodation can be said to have been provided by the appellant for reward. The appellant had no power to go into any of the rooms so long as they were occupied by the tenants, and he certainly would not receive any other person to lodge in the premises because the whole premises were let. The distinction, it seems to me, here is between letting to tenants and letting to lodgers, and unless these premises are occupied by lodgers the appellant cannot be the keeper of a lodging house.

I should have thought that the case was clear were it not for a decision of this court in Rodda v. Godfrey (1). The judgments in that case at first sight appear to be extremely wide, but we must see exactly what were the facts with which the court was dealing. It was found that :

> " . . . several of the rooms of the house were let unfurnished by the appellant to various persons as tenants in separate lettings at rentals ranging from £1 a week to £3 a week, and other rooms were unoccupied."

There was, therefore, an opportunity there for receiving people to lodge or sleep for reward. It was found that :

> " . . . the house was managed on behalf of the appellant by one Scott, whose duties included the cleaning of passages, stairways, landings, water-closets, and bathrooms, the maintenance of the electric light service, and the care of the garden."

That is a finding that the landlord, not by himself, but by his servant, retained control of the house and managed it. There is a large number of cases which are well-known and which used to be very material in the days when revising barristers had to decide who were lodgers and entitled to lodgers' votes and who was an occupier entitled to an ordinary occupier's vote, and the distinction has recently been considered [in Helman v. Horsham and Worthing Assessment Committee (2)] in connection with matters relating to rating. The general test, which has been laid down for many years, is that if the owner of a house who allows other people to live in it lives on the premises and manages the premises himself, or if the owner has a servant resident on the premises to manage them on his behalf, the other people living in the house are lodgers, whereas if he does not live in the house but lets the whole house out to various people it is a letting out of the house in tenements and the persons occupying the tenements are not lodgers but tenants.

On the findings of the magistrate this case seems clearly to fall within the second of those classes, and, therefore, is distinguishable from Rodda v. Godfrey (1). I think Rodda v. Godfrey (1) must be taken to have been decided on its own particular facts and the court must have considered in that case that the defendant retained the management of the house by his servant. There was also the material fact that there were certain unoccupied rooms in the house so that the whole house was not let out but could be regarded as a lodging house, i.e., the magistrates could find that the persons who were in the house were lodgers and the house could be regarded as being within the Order. In the present case I cannot see any evidence to justify the finding that these people were lodgers or were otherwise than tenants to whom rooms had been demised. For those reasons I think the appeal succeeds.

GIBSON AND ANOTHER v. SOUTH AMERICAN STORES, LTD. (GATH & CHAVES) AND OTHERS.

[Chancery Division (Harman, J.), April 28, May 12, 1949.]

Charitable Purpose—Relief of poverty—Requirement of public element—Employees' health and relief fund—Funds provided by company for assistance of necessitous employees and their dependants—Right of company to revoke trust deed and hold fund freed from the trust.

The articles of association of a public limited company, incorporated in 1912 and conducting chain stores in the Argentine Republic and elsewhere, provided that the board of directors should set aside every year two per cent. of its profits for the employees' savings and insurance fund, later called " the Employees' Health and Relief Fund." On Apr. 14, 1918, a trust deed was executed in order to define and declare the trusts on which the fund was and should be held and the terms on which it was and should be administered, and it provided : " (3) The fund shall both as to capital and income and accumulations of income be used and applied at such times and in such manner in all respects for the benefit of such members of the class of beneficiaries hereinafter designated as the [board] shall from time to time direct and (without prejudice to the generality of the discretion intended to be hereby reposed in the [board] may be used and applied in or towards the granting of gratuities pensions or allowances of such respective amounts to be paid to such persons (being members of the said class of beneficiaries) upon such terms and subject to such conditions as the [board] shall from time to time think proper to prescribe. (4) The class of beneficiaries for whose benefit the fund may be used or applied as aforesaid shall include all persons who in the opinion of the [board] are or shall be necessitous and deserving and who for the time being are or have been in the company's employ or the employ of any agents of the company or in the employ of [a subsidiary company] and the wives widows husbands widowers children parents and other dependants of any person who for the time being is or would if living have been himself or herself a member of the class of beneficiaries." The trust deed further provided : " (15) The company may at any time or times with the sanction of a special resolution of the company in general meeting rescind alter or modify the provision of these presents or any of them." Until 1948, when the articles were amended by deleting the direction to the board, the appropriate amount was set aside each year and the sum in the hands of the trustees of the fund rose to £105,000. The fund was employed in accordance with cll. 3 and 4 of the deed, and from time to time gratuities, pensions or allowances were granted to employees and their dependants, including employees in the Argentine, France and Chile. The calls on the fund were much less than its income, and they appeared to be decreasing, and the company desired to wind up the fund, using part of it to contribute to a new pensions scheme, and returning the rest to the ordinary funds of the company free from the trusts.

Held : it being a necessary qualification of beneficiaries under the fund that they were necessitous, the trust was for the relief of poverty ; the class of beneficiaries under the trust deed was sufficiently wide to constitute the public element which was necessary to make it charitable ; and, therefore, the trust was a charitable trust which it was not competent to the company to revoke.

Adjourned Summons to determine inter alia whether a fund provided by a company for the benefit of necessitous employees and their dependants was the subject of a charitable trust, and, if so, whether there was power in the company to revoke that trust. Harman, J., held that the trust was charitable and irrevocable. The facts are set out in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

Lindner for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the fund.

E. Blanshard Stamp for the defendant company.

R. H. Walton for the defendant Barnes, a beneficiary under the trust deed.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. In 1912, there was incorporated under the Companies Acts as a public company the first defendant in this case. It is a company conducting certain chain stores in the Argentine Republic and it has a subsidiary which operates in Chile and certain local subsidiary companies incorporated in Chile and in France. The company's board has always sat in England, where it had certain employees. The company, by art. 134 of its articles of association, laid it down that the board should set aside every year 2 per cent. of its profits for "the employees' savings and insurance fund." This article was modified by special resolution passed on Dec. 29, 1915, and confirmed on Jan. 14, 1916, by changing the style of the object to which the two per cent. above referred to was to be devoted. The amended article provides: "134. The board shall set aside out of the profits of the company in each financial year . . . the following sums . . . (d) Two per cent. thereof to the employees' health and relief fund." Ever since its incorporation down to 1948, the company has, accordingly, set aside two per cent. of its profits for the benefit of this fund which is vested in trustees who are the plaintiffs in the action. The amount in their hands at present is about £105,000. By special resolution passed on Aug. 4, 1948, art. 134 was amended by striking out the words following "(d)" above quoted, so that from that date no further monies of the company accrued to the fund.

There is no evidence what, if any, part of the fund was expended prior to the execution of the deed of Apr. 14, 1918, mentioned in the heading to the summons. By this deed, after reciting art. 134 as it then stood, and that no contribution had ever been made to the fund by any employee of the company and that the fund then stood at rather over £20,000, and reciting that: "It is considered expedient to define and declare the trusts upon which the fund is and shall be held and the terms upon which the same is being and shall be administered", the operative part of the deed provided that the fund should be vested in trustees (as it is now vested in the plaintiffs) and invested with the consent of the London board of the company in certain forms of security. The deed then proceeded:

> "(3) The fund shall both as to capital and income and accumulations of income be used and applied at such times and in such manner in all respects for the benefit of such members of the class of beneficiaries hereinafter designated as the London board shall from time to time direct and (without prejudice to the generality of the discretion intended to be hereby reposed in the London board) may be used and applied in or towards the granting of gratuities pensions or allowances of such respective amounts to be paid to such persons (being members of the said class of beneficiaries) upon such terms and subject to such conditions as the London board shall from time to time think proper to prescribe. (4) The class of beneficiaries for whose benefit the fund may be used or applied as aforesaid shall include all persons who in the opinion of the London board are or shall be necessitous and deserving and who for the time being are or have been in the company's employ or the employ of any agents of the company or in the employ of Gath & Chaves Sociedad Anonima and the wives widows husbands widowers children parents and other dependants of any person who for the time being is or would if living have been himself or herself a member of the class of beneficiaries."

There was a power for the London board to delegate to local authorities certain of its powers. It was provided that membership of the class of beneficiaries should give no right to anybody. Provision was made for the destination of the fund by its distribution among members of the class of beneficiaries in the event of the company's liquidation. Clause 15 provides:

> "The company may at any time or times with the sanction of a special resolution of the company in general meeting rescind alter or modify the provision of these presents or any of them."

The company's Chilean subsidiary had a somewhat similar deed and in 1938 the fund subsisting under that deed was amalgamated with the fund under the deed now in question, and I shall assume for present purposes that this was validly done. Ever since the date of the deed (and I shall assume also before that date) the fund has been administered in accordance with the provisions of cll. 3 and 4 by providing gratuities, pensions or allowances for employees and ex-employees of the company or its agents including the Chilean subsidiary and the companies incorporated in Chile and France and their dependants. At one time as many as seventy ex-employees in the Argentine were in receipt of pensions, but for one reason and another explained in the evidence the number now being assisted is very much less. The persons in the employment of the company and its subsidiaries at present number about 4,400 in the Argentine, about 600 in Chile, about 40 in England and a few in France. There appears to be no record of ex-employees. The persons at present in receipt of benefits from the fund are the defendant, Barnes, and four other ex-employees in England, ten ex-employees in the Argentine, and one ex-employee in France. The calls on the fund are at present very much less than its income, and are, apparently, likely to decrease rather than to increase. The company has also put into operation in England a contributory pension scheme and proposes to put into operation a further non-contributory pension scheme at considerable expense to itself.

In the circumstances the company not unnaturally is desirous, if it can
A properly do so, of winding-up the fund under the deed of 1918, using part of it to contribute to the new pension scheme, and putting the remainder back into the coffers of the company. Accordingly, having obtained the sanction of the company in the form of a special resolution, the board, affecting to act in pursuance of cl. 15 of the deed of 1918, has authorised the execution of a deed poll bearing date Aug. 26, 1948, rescinding the deed of 1918 and declaring
B that the fund shall be held henceforth in trust for the company free from the trusts set forth in the deed of 1918. The questions before me are, first, whether the fund under the deed of 1918 is held on a charitable trust. If not so held, it is admitted that the trusts are void and that there is a resulting trust of the fund to the company from whom alone the fund has emanated. Secondly, whether, if there is a charitable trust, there was any right in the company to C revoke it and to resume the dominion over the fund.

Before considering whether the trusts are charitable, I must construe cll. 3 and 4 of the deed. In my judgment, the class of beneficiaries defined in cl. 4 must all satisfy the requirement of being necessitous and deserving, that is to say, that poverty is a necessary element to qualify a person for benefit. It was suggested to me that, though employees or ex-employees must neces-
D sarily be poor, yet that qualification did not extend to their dependants. I cannot so construe the deed. In my judgment, dependants must be necessitous and deserving just as a member of the primary class of employees or ex-employees must himself or herself be. This, then, is a fund devoted to the relief of poverty, and that is one of the objects of charity set forth in the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4) under the words: "Relief
E to aged impotent and poor people." It is the first of the objects enumerated by LORD MACNAGHTEN in Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs. v. Pemsel (1) where he adopts the classification put forward in argument by Mr. Romilly in Morice v. Bishop of Durham (2) dividing charity in four categories—first, the relief of poverty; secondly, the advancement of education; thirdly, the advancement of religion; and, fourthly, other purposes beneficial to the com-
F munity (these are described in Mr. Romilly's argument as objects of general public utility). The last three categories embrace the rich as well as the poor. Now, charity in its legal sense does not include private charity which in the eye of the law is benevolence, so in the celebrated case of Ommanney v. Butcher (3) a direction to distribute "in private charity" was held not to constitute a charitable trust and in Jones v. Williams (4) charity is defined by LORD
G CAMDEN, L.C., as a general public use.

The public element of charity has been lately emphasised in two cases in the Court of Appeal, namely, Re Compton (5) and Re Hobourn Aero Components, Ltd.'s Air Raid Distress Fund (6). The first of these cases involved a gift to educate members of the family of the testatrix, and the judge of first instance felt constrained to hold this a good charity on the analogy of what
H are known as the "poor relations" cases, where relief of the poverty of a man's own relations was held to be a good charity. The argument was that if to relieve a relation's poverty was an act of charity, so was the relief of his ignorance, and it might have been added so would have been the relief of his ungodliness or want of religion. The Court of Appeal rejected this contention, emphasising that charity must be public and setting aside the poor relations cases on the footing that they were anomalous and ought not to be extended. LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 206), after reciting the cases:

> " In these circumstances the question arises whether we ought to extend the analogy of these decisions so as to cover a trust of the kind now in controversy. Taking the view which I do, as already expressed, I do not think that we are bound or ought to do so. There may perhaps be some special quality in gifts for the relief of poverty which places them in a class by themselves. It may, for instance, be that the relief of poverty is to be regarded as in itself so beneficial to the community that the fact that the gift is confined to a specified family can be disregarded : whereas in the case of an educational trust where there is no poverty qualification the funds may at any time be applied for the purpose of educating a member of the family for whose education ample means are already available, thus providing a purely personal benefit and one freed, incidentally, from the burden of income tax. Failing such a ground of distinction, I can only regard the poor relations cases as anomalous and I prefer to let them remain as such rather than to extend the anomaly to a different class of case."

In Re Hobourn Aero Components, Ltd.'s Air Raid Distress Fund (6), the Court of Appeal had to deal with a fund for the relief of air-raid distress among the employees of a certain firm. It was held that there was no element of poverty involved, and the court rejected the view that this was a charity, for reasons here not material, but dealt again with the cases in which trusts, which apparently would otherwise have failed for want of a public element, were held good because relief of poverty was their object. LORD GREENE, M.R., reviewed the cases and again referred to the poor relations cases in the following terms ([1946] 1 All E.R. 508) :

> " In Re Compton (5) I referred to what are commonly known as the poor relations cases, in which, in the case of a class of potential beneficiaries of a strictly private and personal nature, it had been held in past days that a charitable character was, nevertheless, attributable to the trust if it was a trust for the relief of poverty. The cases mentioned in connection with this passage in TUDOR ON CHARITIES were not quoted to the court on that occasion, and if I have any criticism of the decision in Re Compton (5) it is that, in referring to the poor relations cases as in a category by themselves, I might have added a reference to the other cases mentioned in TUDOR ON CHARITIES as falling into the same category. But no authority has been cited to us which would justify the proposition that what is prima facie a personal or private trust can be saved except on the ground that its purpose is the relief of poverty."

He then cites a number of the cases which are set out in TUDOR ON CHARITIES on the poverty point, and continues :

> " What I have said will perhaps be made clearer by reference to one or two of the authorities which were cited. First, there is Re Clark's Trust (7). That was a case of a friendly society which was held not to be a good charitable institution on the ground that it was a private charity, i.e., a charity not recognised as a charity by law. I can get no help out of that decision except that HALL, V.-C., calls attention to this in connection with the rules of the society (1 Ch.D. 500) : ' Poverty of the member at the time of his sickness or lameness, or in his old age, was not required to entitle him to an allowance. It appears to me that the society was not a charitable institution.' Then comes a decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Spiller v. Maude (8). That case really brings out exactly the point which I mentioned a moment ago. There there was a society which had every mark of a purely personal association with no public element in it at all. It was ' . . . called the York Theatrical Fund Society . . . instituted in York by the voluntary association and sub> scriptions of the members of the York company of actors and actresses.' Under the rules no person save a member of the company was entitled to any benefit at all. The objects were [to provide] the funeral expenses of a contributor dying in indigent circumstances, the relief of orphan children of contributors, the supply of medical advice and medicines to sick contributors unable to pay, and granting annuities to contributors A on becoming incapacitated either by age, accident, or other infirmity, from exercising the duties of his or her profession as an actor or actress and not possessing an independent income of more than £50 per annum. It was a case which seems to me in every respect prima facie to lack any element of publicity and which could not in any sense be described as being for the benefit of a section of the public. It is true that the funds of the society B were augmented by subscriptions from non-members, but the important thing about the case is the way in which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., dealt with it. He went through the rules and came to the conclusion '. . . that the whole fund was charitable, but that the particular charity had failed. He thought that poverty was clearly an ingredient in the qualification of members who were to receive the benefits of the society.' It is perfectly C clear that he regarded poverty as the thing that saved it. I must confess, speaking for myself, that seems to me to be a very extreme decision, because the whole arrangement was of a personal nature. However, it was saved by the fact of poverty . . ."

MORTON, L.J., added these words (ibid., 511):

> D "The third point is that there is no element of poverty in the present case. That, of course, does not prevent a trust from coming within the fourth head of LORD MACNAGHTEN'S classification in Pemsel's case (1), but the relevance of it in the present case is this: Where poverty is essential in the qualification for benefits under a particular fund, there have been cases where trusts which would appear to be of a private nature E have been held to be charitable. An example of this is Spiller v. Maude (8). The reason, as was suggested by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Compton (5), may be that the relief of poverty is regarded as being in itself beneficial to the community. That element being absent in the present case, the appellant cannot rely on these cases . . . But I do not feel inclined to extend the somewhat anomalous line of cases where poverty has been F held to take a trust out of the category of a private trust and into the category of a trust which is charitable in the legal sense."

The position, therefore, on the authorities is now that in the second, third, and fourth categories of charity as defined in Pemsel's case (1) there can be no doubt that a public object is essential, but there is at least a suggestion that this element is not necessary in the first category. I do not myself feel G able to adopt this suggestion. It seems to me that a public object is always necessary to make a trust legally charitable, and that the explanation of the poverty cases is that a much narrower object may in them be considered to work a public benefit than in the other categories. The law may well (as LORD GREENE, M.R., suggested in Compton's case (5)) consider that to relieve even one man's poverty is a benefit to the whole community while to relieve H his ignorance or to minister to his ungodliness is not such a benefit, and similarly with the miscellaneous objects in the fourth category. Viewed in this light, is the object here a public object or no ? I think it is. The Court of Appeal in both the cases referred to has expressly approved of the decision of EVE, J., in Re Drummond (9), where he held that a trust for the benefit of the workpeople of a certain company (not being poor people) was a private object. The court also disapproved Re Rayner (10) where the same judge (without any argument) held that, the promotion of education being a charitable object, the fact that it was confined to the employees of a single firm did not matter. First, be it noted that neither of these cases deals with poverty, and, secondly, both of them were concerned with the employees of a single firm. The present fund is devoted not only to employees, but also to ex-employees, and to the dependants of both classes, and also to the employees and ex-employees and dependants of subsidiary companies, and of agents of the company. This, as it seems to me, in a poverty case, and I say nothing about any other category, is a sufficiently wide class to constitute a public element, and accordingly I hold this to be a good charity. The class seems certainly to be wider than those mentioned in several of the reported cases dealt with recently in the Court of Appeal, for instance Spiller v. Maude (8) (members of the York Theatrical Fund Society); Re Gosling (11) (old and worn out clerks of a banking firm); Re Buck (12) (members of a friendly society and their widows and children).

This, then, being a valid charitable trust, was it competent to the company to revoke it as it purports recently to have done and withdraw the fund from its charitable purpose? In my judgment, it was not. It is true that property can be devoted to charity sub modo or conditionally on the happening of some event, but this fund consists merely of an accumulated proportion of the company's profits which ever since its incorporation has been under its articles devoted to a charitable purpose. I can see no right in the company to revoke this purpose, although it may put an end at any time by alteration of the articles, as it has done, to any obligation to subscribe to it in the future. Consequently, I hold that there was no power under cl. 15 of the deed of 1918 so to revoke it as to withdraw funds already devoted to the charitable object from that object.

Declaration accordingly. The matter referred to chambers for the settlement of a scheme. Costs of all parties to be paid out of the capital of the fund.

ROSE v. HURST.

[Court of Appeal (Lord Greene, M.R., Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), May 5, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—New lease—Rent—Power of tribunal to fix rent above standard rent—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 1—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 5 (2).

By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 1, the rent of any dwelling-house to which the Act applies is limited to the standard rent and any increase above that rent is irrecoverable by the landlord from the tenant. By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (2), where a new lease is granted under the Act "the rent fixed by the tribunal as the rent payable under the new tenancy shall be such rent as the tribunal may determine to be the rent which a willing lessee other than the tenant would agree to give and a willing lessor would agree to accept for the premises . . ."

In 1928 a dwelling-house and shop were let for a term of 21 years at a rent of £90 per annum. In 1939 the premises came within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and £90 became the standard rent. On an application for a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant

Act, 1927, s. 5 (1), a lease was granted by the county court for fourteen years at a yearly rent of £230. The tenant contended that the county court judge had no power to raise the rent above the standard rent.

HELD : as between the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and the Rent Restrictions Acts in this regard the Act of 1927 must be taken to prevail, and, therefore, the rent had been properly fixed at £230.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, sitting at Uxbridge County Court, dated Dec. 16, 1948, granting a new lease at a rent higher than the standard rent of the premises. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of DENNING, L.J.

Stogdon for the tenant.
Astell Burt for the landlord.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J. : The question is whether a tribunal which awards a new lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (1), can fix a rent in excess of the standard rent of the premises. In 1928, a dwelling-house and shop were let for a term of 21 years expiring in March, 1949. The rent was £90 a year, the premises were protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, and the standard rent, therefore, was £90 a year. In due course, under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (1), the tenant claimed a new lease of the premises. The landlords did not dispute that goodwill had become attached to the premises and said that they were willing and able to grant a renewal of the lease of the premises at such rent and for such term not exceeding fourteen years as the tribunal should consider reasonable. The matter was referred to a referee and eventually came before the county court judge who determined that the new lease should be for a term of fourteen years and that the rent should be £230 a year, that sum being, in his view, the rent which a willing lessee other than the tenant would agree to give and a willing lessor would agree to accept for the premises.

The question is whether it was open to the judge to fix the sum of £230 a year having regard to the fact that the standard rent of the premises was £90 a year. It is said that it was impossible for him to do so because of the Rent Restrictions Acts. A new lease has, of course, very considerable advantages over a statutory tenancy. A statutory tenant has only a personal privilege. He cannot assign the premises, nor, indeed, has he full security of tenure, but under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, if the tenant gets a new lease, he gets security for the term of the lease and he has a valuable asset of which he can dispose by assignment to a purchaser. Nevertheless, it is said that the rent payable for the new lease is limited to the standard rent. The matter depends on two statutes. On the one hand, the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 1, provides that the rent of any dwelling-house to which the Act applies is limited to the standard rent and any increase above it is irrecoverable. That applies not only to the original tenancy but also to any subsequent tenancy, and it applies notwithstanding any agreement which may be made between the parties, or any judgment which may be entered as between them. On the other hand, s. 5 (2) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, says that when a new lease is granted under the Act :

> " . . . the rent fixed by the tribunal as the rent payable under the new tenancy shall be such rent as the tribunal may determine to be the rent which a willing lessee other than the tenant would agree to give and a willing lessor would agree to accept for the premises, having regard to > the terms of the tenancy, but irrespective of any goodwill which may have become attached to the premises by reason of the tenant or his predecessors in title having carried on thereat a particular trade or business."

Those two sections cannot possibly apply at one and the same time to the self-same premises. Under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, a tribunal has got to " determine " what the rent is to be. If it had already been fixed by the Rent Acts, there would be nothing for the tribunal to determine. Again, under the Landlord and Tenant Act the rent is to be that which a " willing " lessee would agree to give and a " willing " lessor would agree to accept, but, if the Rent Acts apply, the rent is fixed without regard to what either is " willing " to do. So the two provisions are inconsistent one with the other, and the task of this court is to say which provision is to prevail.

The Act of 1927 is later and more specific than the Act of 1920 and must be taken to prevail. The provisions of the Act of 1927 which I have read must, therefore, be read in this way : " Notwithstanding the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts, the rent fixed by the tribunal shall be such rent as the tribunal may determine to be one which a willing lessee other than the tenant would agree to give and a willing lessor would agree to accept." If the later Act is read thus, it is plain that the rent to be fixed under the provisions of the Act of 1927 is not affected by the provisions as to the standard rent in the Act of 1920.

The second question is this. These premises were not controlled by the Act of 1920 but by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and when the Act of 1939 was passed, nothing was said about the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. If my interpretation of the Act of 1927 is correct, however, it follows that it is not affected by the Act of 1939. The Act of 1939 was a general Act referring to all premises below a certain value. In comparison with it the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was a specific Act. On my interpretation the relevant provisions of the Act of 1927 opened with the words : " Notwithstanding anything in the Rent Restrictions Act, the rent shall be . . ." On that construction the Acts run together, and the rent fixed under the Act of 1927 is not limited to the standard rent. The result is that this tenant gets his new lease at the rent of £230 a year, and in return he has the benefit of a fourteen years' lease which he can assign. In these cases the tenant must elect between two inconsistent rights. He must elect either to remain on as a statutory tenant at the standard rent, or to take a new lease at a rent fixed as between a willing lessor and a willing lessee. He cannot have both the benefit of the new lease and of the standard rent. In this case he has elected to take a new lease, and so he must pay the rent of £230. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the county court judge came to a correct conclusion and the appeal should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree.

LORD GREENE M.R. : I agree. The Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (2), leaves it to the tribunal to decide what the proper terms of a tenancy should be in the matter of rent, duration, and other provisions. On the face of the statute the power of the tribunal in fixing those terms is only limited by express words used in the relevant parts of the Act, but, if the argument addressed to us by the tenant were accepted, it would mean that, in addition to the very limited qualifications expressly imposed by the Act, there must also be applied a further restriction confining and restricting the tribunal's powers. The only way in which such a restriction can be read into the Act of 1927 is by construing it as being subject to the limitation regarding rent imposed under the Rent Restrictions Act, 1920, in respect of premises falling within that Act. Looking at it as a mere matter of construction, and having regard also to what Denning, L.J., has pointed out in relation to the entire difference of approach and the difference in the subject-matters of the two statutes, any such construction as the tenant contends for would lead to a most extravagant result. When I say "difference in subject-matter" I mean that the Act of 1927 is dealing, not with the personal right of occupation in relation to which a restricted rent under the Act of 1920 is payable, but with a totally different form of right, namely, the grant of an estate under a new lease. It would be an extraordinary result if the powers expressed in the widest terms in the Act of 1927 to do justice between the parties were to be limited by the provisions of an Act the whole theory and basis of which is statutory tenancy, as it is inaccurately called, or statutory right of occupancy, as I prefer to call it. On that basis, it seems to me that the Act of 1927 can only be construed as overriding the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Act, 1920. I have nothing to add to what DENNING, L.J., has said with regard to the effects on the Act of 1927, as so construed, on the later Rent Restrictions Acts, and, in my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Birkett and Lynskey, JJ.), April 26, May 6, 1949.]

Street Traffic—Motor vehicle—Insurance against third-party risks—Using vehicle and permitting vehicle to be used on road without a policy of insurance being in force—Company's servant driving company's car on authorised journey—Instructing unlicensed person to drive—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1).

By the terms of an insurance policy a company owning a motor car was insured against liability for "death of or bodily injury to any person" (except a person employed by the company) and "damage to property" other than that of the company arising from an "accident caused by or through or in connection with" the specified car. By an exception clause the insurance company was not to be liable while the car was "being driven with the general consent of the insured by any person who to the insured's knowledge does not hold a licence to drive such a vehicle unless such person has held and is not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence." The policy also covered a person driving the car on the company's order or with its consent, provided that he held a driving licence or had held and was not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence.

The company authorised one of its servants, J.M., who held a driving licence, to drive the car on a certain journey. With the permission of the company J.M. was accompanied by his cousin, a girl of 17, who, to his knowledge, did not hold and had never held a driving licence. During the course of the journey, while the car was on the highway, he allowed his cousin to take the wheel and, while sitting beside her ready to operate the hand-brake, gave her a lesson in driving the car along the road. They were charged, respectively, under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), with permitting a car to be used on the road and with using a car on the road without there being in force in relation to the user a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks as complied with the requirements of pt. II of the Act.

Held : (i) if a policy of insurance was in force covering the user of the car at the material time in respect of third-party risks, a policy covering the personal liability of the driver was not required under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1).

(ii) on the facts of the case, J.M. still retained the control and management of the car at the material time, and, therefore, he remained the driver of the car, and, in allowing his cousin to take the wheel under his directions, he was acting within the scope of his employment, although in an unauthorised and improper way. Therefore, if, while the car was being so driven, an injury had been caused to a third party as a result of the negligent driving of the car, the company would have been liable, as the negligence could have been attributed to its servant, J.M., acting within the scope of his employment.

(iii) the liability of the company to third persons injured by the negligence of one of its servants who was driving the car in the course of his employment was clearly covered by the operative words of the insurance policy, and, as J.M.'s cousin was not driving with the company's consent or knowledge, the insurance company's liability was not excluded by the terms of the exception clause. Therefore, a policy of insurance in respect of third-party risks, complying with the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, was in force in relation to the user of the car at the material time.

Cases Stated by Cumberland justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Penrith on Oct. 12, 1948, informations under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), were preferred by the appellant, Walter Thomas Marsh, against the respondent, John Moores, charging him with having permitted a motor car to be used on a road when there was not in force in relation to the user of the car such a policy of insurance against third-party risks as complied with the requirements of the Act. The second respondent, Patricia Moores, was charged under the same section with having used the motor car at the same time and in like circumstances. The car was the property of John Moores' employers who were insured in respect of it and had authorised John Moores to drive it. At the material time, John Moores, while on the authorised journey, had allowed Patricia Moores, who had not got a driving licence, to take over the wheel of the car and was instructing her to drive it, while he himself retained control of the hand-brake. The justices dismissed the informations, and the Divisional Court now dismissed appeals from their orders on the ground that, on the facts of the cases, the user of the car at the material time was covered by the employers' policy of insurance, as John Moores was acting at the time within the scope of his employment, although in an unauthorised way. The facts appear in the judgment of LYNSKEY, J.

C. Q. Henriques for the appellant.
Blackledge for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

A May 6. The following judgments were read.

LYNSKEY, J. : These were two appeals by way of Cases Stated by the Penrith petty sessional division of the county of Cumberland arising out of the same set of circumstances. In the first case Walter Thomas Marsh (hereinafter called the appellant) preferred an information under the Road Traffic
B Act, 1930, s. 35 (1), against John Moores for that he on Aug. 30, 1948, at Plumpton Head in the parish of Hesket did permit a private motor car FKD 14 to be used on a road without there being in force in relation to the user of the vehicle such a policy of insurance or such a security in respect of third party risks as complied with the requirements of pt. II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. In the second case a similar information was preferred by the appellant against
C Patricia Moores with the variation that she was charged with having used the said motor car on the same date and at the same place and in the like circumstances. Both informations were heard by the justices on Oct. 12, 1948, and they dismissed both informations. The appellant, being dissatisfied, applied to the justices to state a Case in respect of each information and these Cases were accordingly stated.

D The facts proved or admitted before the justices as set out in the two Cases are hereinafter set out. A Morris 10 h.p. motor car, registered number FKD 14, (hereinafter called the " vehicle ") was the property of Littlewood's Mail Order Stores, Ltd., of Liverpool (hereinafter called " the company ") and was duly registered and licensed in the name of the company. The respondent, John Moores, was in the employ of the company, and his father was managing director
E of the company. The respondent, John Moores, on Aug. 30, 1948, was the duly appointed driver of the vehicle on a journey undertaken for social purposes on the instructions of his father as managing director of the company. John Moores was accompanied on the journey, with the knowledge and permission of his father, by his cousin, the respondent, Patricia Moores. The respondent, John Moores, was in possession of a current motor car driving licence, but the
F respondent, Patricia Moores, who was 17 years of age, was not in possession of and had not been issued with a motor car driving licence, and this fact was known to the respondent, John Moores. While the vehicle was on the highway at Plumpton Head, the respondent, John Moores, on his own initiative allowed Patricia Moores to take the wheel and whilst the vehicle still proceeded on the route of its authorised journey, and whilst sitting beside her ready to operate
G the hand-brake, he gave her a lesson in driving the vehicle along the said highway. Shortly after the lesson had commenced, the vehicle was overtaken by a police car and ordered to pull up. It was then ascertained by the police that Patricia Moores was not the holder of a driving licence.

For the purposes of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the company was insured in respect of the use of the vehicle with the Palatine Insurance Co., Ltd.
H The policy of insurance was proved before the justices, and a copy was exhibited to the Cases. By the policy the company was covered in respect of the said motor vehicle (inter alia) for liability to third parties. The terms of this cover were :

> " The [insurance] company will indemnify the insured in the event of accident caused by or through or in connection with any motor car described in the schedule hereto in Great Britain, Ireland, the Isle of Man or the Channel Islands against all sums including claimants' costs > and expenses which the insured shall become legally liable to pay in respect of (i) death of or bodily injury to any person except where such death or bodily injury arises out of and in the course of the employment of such person by the insured, and (ii) damage to property other than property belonging to the insured or held in trust by or in the custody or control of the insured."

The vehicle FKD 14 was one of the vehicles described in the schedule to the policy. The exception to this general cover, so far as it is material in these cases, was in the following terms :

> "The insurance company shall not be liable in respect of (i) any accident injury loss damage or liability caused sustained or incurred whilst any motor vehicle in respect of or in connection with which insurance is granted under this policy is (a) being used otherwise than in accordance with the 'description of use' contained in this policy (b) being driven by the insured unless he (i) holds a licence to drive such vehicle or (ii) has held and is not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence (c) being driven with the general consent of the insured by any person who to the insured's knowledge does not hold a licence to drive such a vehicle unless such person has held and is not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence."

The "description of use" contained in the policy was :

> "Use for social domestic and pleasure purposes and use for the business of the insured as stated in the schedule hereto."

The policy was also by its terms extended to cover drivers of the vehicles in certain circumstances. This extension cover reads :

> "In terms of and subject to the limitations of and for the purposes of this section (i.e., liability to third parties) (i) the [insurance] company will indemnify any person who is driving such motor car on the insured's order or with his permission provided (a) that such person is not entitled to indemnity under any other policy (b) that such person shall as though he were the insured observe fulfil and be subject to the terms exceptions and conditions of this policy in so far as they can apply (c) that such person holds a licence to drive such motor car or has held and is not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence."

The contention of the appellant in both cases was that the respondent, Patricia Moores, was driving and using the vehicle at the material time without the permission or the knowledge of the company, and that the respondent, John Moores, had no authority from the company to permit, as he did, the respondent, Patricia Moores, to drive the vehicle. In these circumstances, there would be no legal liability on the part of the company if third parties were injured as the result of her negligence, and the company's policy of insurance would not cover liability to such third parties. Further, the policy would not by its extension of cover operate to indemnify Patricia Moores as she was not driving the vehicle with the permission of the company and in any event did not hold a licence to drive such a motor and had not held such a licence as required by the conditions of the extension of cover. On the part of the respondents it was contended that, although it might be that the company was not liable for the negligence of Patricia Moores in causing injury to third parties, it was liable for the negligence of its servant, John Moores, in the driving, management and control of the vehicle, and that, if he permitted a driver whom he knew to be inexpert to drive the vehicle, whether under his supervision or not, that was a negligent act within the scope of his employment for which his employers would be liable. In such a case, it was said, the company's policy of insurance would cover its liability to third parties, and was a policy sufficient to comply with the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, although the personal liability of Patricia Moores was not covered by a policy of insurance.

The first question raised by these contentions is : What is the true construction of s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 ? Does that section require that there should be a policy of insurance in force which covers the personal liability
A of the driver, or is it sufficient that there should be a policy in force covering the then user of the car in respect of third party risks ? This question was considered by this court in John T. Ellis, Ltd. v. Hinds (1). In that case the appellants were the owners of a motor vehicle which was driven by their servant, McDonald, a boy under the age of 17 years who did not hold, and, because of his age, could not obtain, a driving licence. The motor vehicle came into
B collision with a motor omnibus while being driven by this boy. The appellants were summoned for unlawfully permitting the use of the vehicle on the road when there was not in force in relation to the user of the vehicle by the person using it a policy of insurance complying with the Road Traffic Act, 1930. In that case the appellants had no knowledge of the boy's age or of the fact that he held no driving licence. The appellants held a policy of
C insurance which did not cover the personal liability of the boy to third parties but did cover the liability of the appellants to such third parties while the boy was driving their vehicle. The appellants were convicted before the justices, but on appeal by way of Case Stated this court held that s. 35 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, did not require that there should be in force a policy which covered the driver's liability, and that, if at the material time the owners of D the vehicle were within the cover of the policy in respect of the driving of the vehicle by the boy, there would be in force a policy in relation to the user of the vehicle by the boy driver, and, therefore, that no offence had been committed by the appellants. In his judgment, HUMPHREYS, J., said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 341) :

> " The reason, as I think, is that it is not any particular person who uses
> E the vehicle who is required by s. 35 to be insured. What is required is that the user on the road by the person or persons in fact using should be covered by insurance in respect of third party risks. In the present case, the appellants, as the owners, had a policy which indemnified them against any liability which might be incurred by them in respect of death or bodily injury to any person arising out of the use on the road of the vehicle.
> F The policy was, therefore, one which complied with the requirements of s. 36 (1) of the Act. The contention of counsel for the respondent is that something further is required by s. 35, namely, an insurance indemnifying the driver, McDonald. I find nothing in the section to support that contention. I think the true view of the section is that what must be covered by insurance in respect of third party risks is the use on the road of the > G vehicle by the driver. On the facts stated in the Case, McDonald was driving the vehicle as the servant of the appellants, and was acting in the scope of his authority. The appellants, therefore, were plainly liable for the consequences of any negligence displayed by McDonald in the course of his driving."

As a result of this decision the question we have to consider in these cases
H is not whether Patricia Moores or John Moores was insured in respect of his or her personal liability, but whether, if a third party had sustained injuries as a result of the user of the car in the circumstances set out in the Cases, such third party could have recovered damages in respect of such injuries from the company and whether the company was indemnified in respect of such damages under its policy of insurance. John Moores was a servant of the company and as such was entrusted by the company with the control, management and driving of the vehicle in question on Aug. 30, 1948. It is well settled law that a master is liable even for acts which he has not authorised provided that they are so connected with the acts which he has authorised that they may rightly be regarded as modes, although improper modes, of doing them. On the other hand, if the unauthorised and wrongful act of the servant is not so connected with the authorised act as to be a mode of doing it, but is an independent act, the master is not responsible, for in such a case the servant is not acting in the course of his employment but has gone outside it: see A Booth v. Mister (2), Beard v. London General Omnibus Co. (3), and Canadian Pacific Ry. Co. v. Lockhart (4). In the course of the argument we were referred to Ricketts v. Thomas Tilling, Ltd. (5), which was an example of the application of these principles. In that case the driver of a motor omnibus allowed the conductor to drive the omnibus. The driver was sitting next to the conductor and could see what the latter was doing and he could control what was going B on. Phillimore, L.J., stated ([1915] 1 K.B. 649):

> "The question here really is, Was the driver still in charge of this omnibus, and did the accident happen because he neglected his duty?"

Pickford, L.J., summarised the position in these words (ibid., 651):

> "It seems to me at any rate that there is evidence of negligence on C his part, he being there and still having the duty of the controlling and the driving of the omnibus, in allowing the omnibus to be negligently driven whereby the accident happened."

In that case, the only question before the court was whether there was evidence of negligence to go to a jury, and the court held that there was such evidence.

In all these cases it must be a question of fact whether an unauthorised D act by a servant is within the scope of his employment or outside his employment. In the cases we are now considering, the justices have found as facts that the respondent, John Moores, was the duly appointed driver of the vehicle, and that, while the vehicle was still proceeding on the route of its authorised journey, on his own initiative he allowed the respondent, Patricia Moores, to take the wheel and, while sitting beside her ready to operate the E hand-brake, gave her a lesson in driving the vehicle along the road. In acting as he did, was John Moores doing an unauthorised act within the scope of his employment or an unauthorised act outside his employment? In my view, he still retained the control and management of the vehicle. He still retained some power to control the driving of the vehicle by operating the hand-brake and in instructing Patricia Moores as to how she should drive. In these F circumstances, it seems to me that he still remained the driver of the car, and in allowing Patricia Moores to take the wheel under his directions he was acting within the scope of his employment, although in an unauthorised and improper way. If an injury was caused to a third party while the vehicle was being so driven as the result of the negligent driving of the vehicle, John Moores would be, at least in part, responsible for such negligence, and the company, G as his employer, would in turn be responsible vicariously for the negligence of its servant acting within the scope of his employment.

The final question remaining is whether the company would be entitled to be indemnified under its policy of insurance for this responsibility. By the policy the insurance company undertake to indemnify the company in the event of an accident caused by or through or in connection with the vehicle H against all sums which the company shall become legally liable to pay in respect of the death of or bodily injury to any person or damage to property. I have not quoted in full the operative words of the policy, but only such words as are material to the facts of these cases. The liability of the company to third persons injured whilst the vehicle was being driven in the circumstances described in the Cases are clearly covered by these words in the policy. The only relevant exception clause, (i) (c), does not operate to relieve the insurance company from its liability to indemnify the company under the general cover contained in the policy. The only person driving with the general consent of the company was John Moores who held a licence to drive the vehicle, and Patricia Moores, who did not hold and who had not held such a licence, was not driving with the consent of the company or with its knowledge. In the result, in my view the use of the vehicle on the road in the circumstances appearing in the Cases was a user in relation to which there was a policy of insurance in respect of third party risks which complied with the requirements of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The justices were right in their decisions in these cases and these appeals should be dismissed.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : I agree with the judgment of LYNSKEY, J., which he has just delivered, and I add a few words only for the purpose of pointing out to justices and the police the difference between this case and Reay v. Young (6). In the present case the company which is the owner of the car was insured under a policy which gave the widest possible cover to the company. It was indemnified in the event of accident caused by or through or in connection with the motor car described in the schedule against all sums which the company might become legally liable to pay in respect of damage sustained by a third person. The company was, accordingly, covered against any damages which it might be called on to pay in respect of the negligence of a servant of the company who was driving the car in the course of his employment, quite independently of the extension clause in the policy whereby the insurance company agreed to indemnify the driver against any liability which he personally might incur. The general exceptions have no application because no permission had been granted by the company to Patricia Moores to drive, nor could any knowledge that she was driving or was unlicensed be attributed to them. The question, therefore, is whether, had an accident occurred through the negligence or unskilful driving of Patricia Moores the company would have been liable ? In my opinion, it would. Her driving took place in the course of a journey which John Moores had been instructed by the company to take, and he was driving as its servant throughout. The driving of Patricia Moores took place in the course of an authorised journey and while the car was on its authorised route. If, then, she had injured a third person, negligence could be attributed to the driver either because he allowed an unskilful person to drive or because he himself did not take steps to avoid the accident. Had he departed from his route so that it could be said that he had gone off on what is usually called a frolic of his own in the course of which he allowed Patricia Moores to drive, the case might well have been different, but on the facts of this case I think it amounts to a servant doing an unauthorised act, but doing it during and in the course of his employment and, therefore, within the scope of his employment. In Reay v. Young (6) a husband, who was insured, allowed his wife, who was uninsured, to drive the car, he himself being present. She was not driving as his servant. There was no question, therefore, of her driving within the scope of any employment. As the husband knew that his wife did not hold a licence, the general exceptions clause, if he held a policy in the same form as the present, would have operated to exempt the insurance company from liability. The defendants in that case had both pleaded Guilty, and it is quite clear that they were right in doing so. I agree that the appeals should be dismissed.

Maintenance—Justices—Jurisdiction—Husband ordinarily resident in Scotland —Wife resident in England—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 4.

In June, 1948, the parties were living in Manchester where the husband had been working for three years. He then refused to continue living there, gave up his work, went to his parents' house in Inverness, and wrote to his wife saying that he had two rooms in the house which he would be able to "call his own." Later, he stated that he had obtained work at Inverness and intended to settle there. The wife thereupon took out a summons before the Manchester justices, alleging desertion. This summons was served on the husband in Inverness, and on July 22, 1948, the justices made an order against him.

Held: the husband being ordinarily resident out of the jurisdiction, the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order against him.

Appeal by the wife from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Merriman, P., and Hodson, J.) dated Dec. 14, 1948, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 290, setting aside an order of the Manchester city justices.

On July 22, 1948, the husband having left his wife in Manchester and returned to his parents in Inverness, the justices made an order against him on the ground of desertion. On appeal the Divisional Court held that, the husband being ordinarily resident in Scotland, the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order. The Court of Appeal now affirmed this decision. The facts appear in the judgment of Somervell, L.J.

Harris Walker for the husband.
John Mortimer for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will ask Somervell, L.J., to give the first judgment.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the wife from a decision of the Divisional Court which set aside an order made by the Manchester city justices against the husband on the ground that he had deserted his wife. The decision of the Divisional Court was based on the ground that the justices had no jurisdiction. The marriage took place in October, 1943. The husband, having been in the Royal Air Force for some 13 years, was demobilised in October, 1945, and the parties resided with the wife's parents in Manchester from that date till June, 1948, subject to a break in 1945 when there was a quarrel between the husband and the wife, and the husband left her and went for a time to Inverness where his parents lived. In June, 1948, he announced his intention of leaving his wife, and on June 24 or 25 he left the house where they had been living and went to Inverness. On July 1, a summons was taken out by the wife, but it was not served on the husband. Later the summons with which we are concerned was issued and was served on the husband in Inverness.

The relevant evidence consists, first, of a letter written by the husband to the wife which she received about the time when the summons was issued. It is written from Inverness. He says:

> A "I am writing to let you know that I have decided to have my home in Inverness. I have got the two rooms at the back which I will improve on. I will add a scullery and one or two other things on to it, which will make it independent of the main house, also I shall be running the garden. It can be made into a nice place and I shall have a place I can call my own. That is all I will say now. I shall leave the rest to you. Please let > B me know what you intend to do as I would like to know one way or the other. I will close now, hoping to have an early reply."

When the matter came before the justices, the wife gave evidence of ill-treatment and desertion, and, so far as that letter was an offer by the husband to make a home for the wife in Inverness, the justices, apparently, did not regard it as a genuine offer or as in any way precluding them from finding, as they
C did, that the husband had deserted the wife. At the proceedings the husband was represented by a solicitor, and a precognition by the husband was read in which he said:

> "Things came to such a pass recently that I decided that it was essential that my wife and I should leave the house and I, accordingly,
> D made arrangements to move up to Inverness, where I had arranged to have a furnished accommodation in my mother's house at Thornbank, Clachnaharry. My wife refused to accompany me. I am living in two rooms in mother's house. These are quite separate from the rest of the house, in which also live my mother and one of my brothers. My father died recently. I have also taken up employment in Inverness and intend > E settling down here."

Before the justices no submission as to jurisdiction was made, but when the appeal was taken to the Divisional Court the point was taken and the Divisional Court decided that the justices had no jurisdiction. The question is whether this case is covered by the decision of this court in Forsyth v. Forsyth (1). There the husband was domiciled and resident in Scotland, the F wife complained that he had deserted her there by remaining there after she had come to England on the understanding that he would follow her, and it was held that, as the husband was not shown to have been in England at any material time, the justices had no jurisdiction to entertain the wife's complaint. That decision was based on the decision of the House of Lords in Berkeley v. Thompson (2).

G Berkeley v. Thompson (2) raised a question of the proper construction of the Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881. Section 4 of that Act provided:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act, any process issued under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts may, if issued by a court of summary jurisdiction in England and endorsed by a court of summary jurisdiction
> H in Scotland, or issued by a court of summary jurisdiction in Scotland and endorsed by a court of summary jurisdiction in England, be served and executed within the jurisdiction of the endorsing court in like manner as it may be served and executed in the jurisdiction of the issuing court, and that by an officer either of the issuing or of the endorsing court."

There are further provisions with regard to process, and a special section as to bastardy, on which the decision in Berkeley v. Thompson (2) largely turned, and certain definitions. The headnote in Berkeley v. Thompson (2) is:

> "The Summary Jurisdiction (Process) Act, 1881, does not enable a bastardy summons to be issued by justices in England and served in Scotland upon the putative father domiciled and resident in Scotland; and if a summons is so served and the putative father does not appear before the justices they have no jurisdiction to make a bastardy order against him."

A In that case it was argued for the unsuccessful party (the woman) that s. 4. gave jurisdiction to serve a summons although the Bastardy Acts did not apply to Scotland and the court normally would not have had jurisdiction in respect of the putative father if he was resident in Scotland, but the House of Lords decided that s. 4 did not extend to jurisdiction in bastardy matters. In coming to that conclusion they largely relied on s. 6 of the Act which dealt B with bastardy proceedings. That is a decision of the House of Lords on the general scope of s. 4 of the Act of 1881, and it was applied by this court in Forsyth v. Forsyth (1).

In Forsyth v. Forsyth (1) there was no evidence that the husband had ever been in England. In the present case it is agreed that he was in Manchester until the time that he deserted his wife, and that makes a difference C on which, among other things, counsel for the wife relies. The Divisional Court in the present case considered Forsyth v. Forsyth (1) from that point of view. It was argued before them that Forsyth v. Forsyth (1) was decided as it was because the husband was domiciled in Scotland. On the other hand, it was argued that the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J., which was the main judgment in Forsyth v. Forsyth (1), was based, not on domicil, but on the fact D that the husband was ordinarily resident in Scotland. I agree with what the Divisional Court said about that decision and the principles which it laid down. If, in the present case, the husband was ordinarily resident in Scotland at the time when the summons was issued, then, in my view, this case is covered by the decision in Forsyth v. Forsyth (1). That was the view which the Divisional Court took. Both LORD MERRIMAN, P., and HODSON, J., came to the conclusion E that at the material date the husband was ordinarily resident in Scotland. The learned President said:

> "From the moment he travelled to Inverness (and, in my opinion, there is nothing to displace the inference, as I have already said, that he did that on the day after he left his wife) it seems to me that all the evidence tends to show that he was ordinarily resident in Scotland. The only thing F we do not know is whether he actually got work in Inverness, but there is the letter about the flat in his parents' house, and the statement in his precognition that he would not have given up his work in Manchester but for the reason that he realised that life in Manchester was impossible, and other things of that sort, which all seem to me to tend in the same direction."

G It seems to me that that is the right conclusion. The justices found that this man had deserted his wife. The only matrimonial home that they had ever had was with her parents. The husband decided to leave the wife. He went to Scotland where his home and mother were, he said he intended to settle there, and he described in his letter the arrangements that he was H making to provide himself with a home there. In those circumstances only one conclusion is possible, namely, that he was ordinarily resident there at that time. The fact that the desertion took place in England and that he was ordinarily resident in England up to a short time before does not affect the matter. Ordinary residence is a thing which can be changed in a day. A man is ordinarily resident in one place up till a particular day. He then cuts the connection he has with that place—in this case he left his wife; in another case he might have disposed of his house—and makes arrangements to have his home somewhere else. Where there are indications that the place to which he moves is the place which he intends to make his home for, at any rate, an indefinite period, as from that date he is ordinarily resident at that place. For those reasons I think the facts relied on by counsel for the wife do not displace the conclusion to which the members of the Divisional Court came, that the husband was ordinarily resident in Scotland at the material date, and, therefore, applying Forsyth v. Forsyth (1), the justices had no jurisdiction, and this appeal fails.

Counsel for the husband raised a further argument. He submitted that the justices would have had no jurisdiction even though the presence of the husband in Scotland fell short of ordinary residence. I would require a good deal of argument on both sides before accepting that proposition. In considering these cases of jurisdiction it is important to distinguish two different aspects of the subject. Is one considering a case where the court would not have jurisdiction even if the defendant was in this country and could be served, or is the case one in which the court would obviously have jurisdiction provided the defendant could be served ? One can illustrate the distinction very easily from this branch of the law. The ordinary position in actions in personam is that, if the defendant can be found here and served, the plaintiff can proceed. Take the case, however, of a petition for the dissolution of a marriage. If this country is not the domicil of the parties, the court will not exercise jurisdiction although the husband or the wife is here and can be served with the petition. One, therefore, has to bear that distinction in mind, and it is not clear to me, either in general principle, or, in particular, from the wording of s. 6 of the Act of 1881, which deals with the somewhat similar position in bastardy, that the court here would not have jurisdiction to deal with a case of this kind where the husband, though in Scotland, was there in circumstances which fell short of ordinary residence. Those points can be left to be dealt with if and when they arise.

ROBERTS v. COOMBS.

Medicine and Pharmacy -Drugs—Restrictions on supply—" Person acting in accordance with the directions " of a qualified practitioner—Shopkeeper supplying drug to doctor's prescription—Penicillin Act, 1947 (c. 29), s. 1 (1) (a), (b).

By the Penicillin Act, 1947, s. 1 : " (1) . . . no person shall sell or otherwise supply any substance to which this Act applies or any preparation of which any such substance is an ingredient or part unless (a) he is a duly qualified medical practitioner, a registered dental practitioner or a registered veterinary surgeon, or a person acting in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon, and the substance or preparation is sold or supplied for the purposes of treatment by or in accordance with the directions of that practitioner or surgeon ; or (b) he is a registered pharmacist or an authorised seller of poisons, and the substance or preparation is sold or supplied under the authority of a prescription signed and dated by any such practitioner or surgeon as aforesaid."

The respondent, a shopkeeper carrying on the business of selling by retail drugs and surgical appliances, who was not one of the qualified or registered persons specified in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1947 nor an authorised seller of poisons, sold ointment containing penicillin to a customer who presented a prescription signed and dated by a qualified medical practitioner.

Held : the words "a person acting in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon" in s. 1 (1) (a), meant a person acting on the direct order of the practitioner or surgeon, such as a dispenser, and, therefore, the respondent did not fall within those words ; a prescription by a medical practitioner could only be made up by a registered pharmacist or authorised seller of poisons under s. 1 (1) (b) ; and, accordingly, the respondent had committed a breach of the section.

Quaere whether a substance to which the Act applies could ever be supplied "in accordance with the directions" of a practitioner or surgeon within s. 1 (1) unless the person supplying was a dispenser employed by the practitioner and surgeon.

[For the Penicillin Act, 1947, s. 1 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 40, p. 608.]

Case Stated by Middlesex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Feltham on Dec. 21, 1948, informations were preferred by the appellant, an inspector appointed by the Pharmaceutical Society under the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, s. 25, charging the respondent with having on four occasions sold penicillin in the form of an ointment, contrary to s. 1 (1) of the Penicillin Act, 1947, he not being a person mentioned in that sub-section. The justices found that the respondent carried on a business in a shop which included the sale by retail of drugs and surgical appliances. He was not a qualified medical practitioner, registered dental practitioner, veterinary surgeon, pharmacist or authorised seller of poisons, but the ointment was supplied in each case under the purported authority of a prescription in writing signed and dated by a medical practitioner. The justices held that the respondent was a person acting in accordance with the directions of a duly qualified practitioner and the penicillin was supplied in accordance with such directions within the meaning of s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947 and dismissed the informations. The appellant appealed, and the Divisional Court now allowed the appeal.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and T. Dewar for the appellant.
L. R. Miller for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by Middlesex justices before whom the respondent, who keeps a shop at which he sells by retail drugs and surgical appliances, was charged on four informations with offences against s. 1 of the Penicillin Act, 1947, in that he supplied on four different occasions penicillin ointment to persons who had doctors' prescriptions. Section 1 of the Act provides :

> " . . . no person shall sell or otherwise supply any substance to which this Act applies or any preparation of which any such substance is an ingredient or part unless (a) he is a duly qualified medical practitioner, a registered dental practitioner or a registered veterinary surgeon, or a person acting in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon, and the substance or preparation is sold or supplied for the purposes of treatment by or in accordance with the directions of that > practitioner or surgeon; or (b) he is a registered pharmacist or an authorised seller of poisons, and the substance or preparation is sold or supplied under the authority of a prescription signed and dated by any such practitioner or surgeon as aforesaid."

Therefore, if a person is a registered pharmacist or seller of poisons he may supply the penicillin provided he does it under the authority of a prescription. A If it is said that notwithstanding that, any person can supply penicillin if he can produce a doctor's prescription, what was the object of including para. (b), which provides that a registered pharmacist may supply the drug provided he does so in accordance with a prescription? As counsel for the appellant has pointed out, if we were to give the wide meaning to para. (a) which is contended for, the registered pharmacist would be at a disadvantage B because as a registered pharmacist he could only supply on a doctor's prescription, whereas if he were not a registered pharmacist, he could supply the drug if a doctor directed it to be supplied. It is clear that to give an intelligent meaning to both these paragraphs we must read "a person acting in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon" as meaning a person acting on the direct order, for instance, C a dispenser employed by a doctor. If the doctor tells his dispenser: "Make up a penicillin prescription and give it to one of the patients," the dispenser is acting under the directions of the doctor. If, however, the doctor gives a prescription to a person, in my opinion, the only intelligible meaning we can give to the words is that that prescription must be dispensed by a registered pharmacist. The reason is to keep the supply and storing of this D drug under the control of qualified persons. A doctor can supply the drug, or cause it to be supplied by somebody acting under his directions, and a registered pharmacist can supply it if he is given a prescription by a doctor. The plain meaning of the section, if a meaning is to be given to para. (b) as well as to para. (a), is that an unregistered person is not entitled to supply on the prescription of a doctor. An unregistered person cannot supply unless E that person is in the employment of a doctor or in some way actually under the direct orders of the doctor. I doubt if it could ever be said that penicillin could be supplied in accordance with the directions of a practitioner or surgeon unless it was by a doctor's own dispenser, but I do not think it is necessary to decide that. In the circumstances, I think the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that the offences were proved in each case.

F BIRKETT, J.: I am of the same opinion. The Penicillin Act, 1947, is "An Act to control the sale and supply of penicillin and certain other substances." By s. 1 (1) the method of control, as I read the statute, is that in para. (a) a specific class of persons is designated:

> G "... a duly qualified medical practitioner, a registered dental practitioner or a registered veterinary surgeon, or a person acting in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon ..."

Then the concluding words of the paragraph are important:

> "... and the substance or preparation is sold or supplied for the purposes of treatment by or in accordance with the directions of that practitioner or surgeon."

H That is the first class. The second class is:

> "... a registered pharmacist or an authorised seller of poisons, and the substance or preparation is sold or supplied under the authority of a prescription signed and dated by any such practitioner or surgeon as aforesaid."

Therefore, the method of control was clearly to designate the classes of persons who were authorised by law to sell or supply penicillin. The only arguable point taken by counsel for the respondent is that if a duly qualified medical practitioner, for example, gives a prescription containing penicillin to a patient and an unregistered or unqualified person makes up that prescription, he was then a person acting in accordance with the directions " of any such practitioner or surgeon." I cannot read the statute in that way. To a large extent any such reading would defeat the control which was designed and laid down in the sub-section. Further, the word " prescription " is universally known. It is, indeed, used in para. (b) : " under the authority of a prescription signed and dated by any such practitioner." When the prescription signed and dated by the medical practitioner or the surgeon comes into being, it can only be made up by a registered pharmacist or an authorised seller of poisons. It is clear that, if it had been intended that any such prescription signed by any such practitioner might be made up by anybody, the statute would have been able to say so. That is an additional reason for my thinking that the words " or a person acting in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon " cannot possibly be an unauthorised practitioner. For these reasons I agree with the conclusion announced by my Lord.

LYNSKEY, J. : I agree. In my view, s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act deals with directions given by a practitioner or surgeon for the purposes of treatment by or in accordance with his directions, and they must be directions given to the person who is supplying or selling the substance. If such directions are given to that person particularly by the doctor, so that he is acting under the doctor's immediate orders, it may be that, whether qualified or not, he comes within the protection of sub-s. (1) (a). Sub-section (1) (b) deals with written prescriptions, and written prescriptions as a rule are not directed to any particular person. It is difficult to say in those circumstances that the pharmacist would be acting under the directions of the doctor in the actual supply for the purposes of treatment. The directions are given to the patient to enable him to obtain a supply of the material. In my view, whatever else " in accordance with the directions of any such practitioner or surgeon " in para. (a) may mean, having regard to the presence of para. (b) such a direction cannot be contained in the prescription. In those circumstances, the case ought to go back to the justices to say that the offences were proved.

R. v. CLUCAS.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver, Birkett, Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), May 10, 1949.]

Criminal Law—False pretences—Bookmaker induced to accept bet by false pretence as to identity—Money paid on winning horse—Conspiracy—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 32 (1).

The appellant was convicted with one R. of conspiracy to defraud bookmakers, and, on further counts, of obtaining money from bookmakers by false pretences. The two men induced the bookmakers to bet with them by representing that they were commission agents acting on behalf of a number of workmen who were placing small bets on horse races, whereas, in fact, they were making large bets on their own account.

Some of these bets they won and in respect thereof they received money from the bookmakers. On one of the bookmakers being unwilling to pay money to R. on a winning bet, R. invited him to telephone to a certain number (as being that of the place of employment of the workmen in question) to obtain confirmation of R.'s story. In fact, the number was that of a public telephone near which the appellant was waiting to answer A the telephone of the bookmaker should he communicate with the number.

HELD: (i) a person who induced a bookmaker to bet with him by making false pretences as to his identity or as to the capacity in which he was making the bets did not obtain money by false pretences if he backed a winning horse and so received money from the bookmaker, the effective cause of his obtaining the money being, not the false pretences, but his B having made a winning bet, and, therefore, the convictions of the appellant on the counts charging false pretences must be quashed.

R. v. Button ([1900] 2 Q.B. 597), distinguished.

(ii) even without the evidence relating to R.'s giving the bookmaker the number of the public telephone, there was abundant evidence of the conspiracy charged, and the conviction of the appellant on that count C would be affirmed.

APPEAL against conviction and sentence.

The appellant was convicted at Norwich Assizes before HALLETT, J., on charges E of conspiracy to defraud and obtaining money by false pretences and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. The court dismissed the appeal on the charge of conspiracy, but quashed the convictions on the charges of obtaining by false pretences, and the sentence was reduced to one year's imprisonment. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

F Honig for the appellant.
Boileau for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant was convicted with a man named Revell before HALLETT, J., at the Norfolk Assizes on six counts of an indictment which charged, in the first count, a conspiracy between the two prisoners to defraud a bookmaker named Gamble by falsely pretending that Revell was G employed at the Suttonbridge aerodrome and was in a position to act or was acting as a commission agent for the collection of bets by workmen at the aerodrome. The third count alleged a similar conspiracy to defraud a bookmaker named Cranmer by the same and some additional false pretences. In the fourth count both prisoners were charged that with intent to defraud they attempted to obtain from Gamble a sum of money by falsely pretending that some third H person had asked them to place bets on a horse and that they were acting as agents in placing that bet. The fifth count charged them that with intent to defraud they obtained from Cranmer a sum of money by making the same or similar false pretences, and the seventh count charged the appellant alone "with intent to defraud obtained from S. C. Cranmer & Co., a valuable security, namely a banker's cheque for £123 6*s.* 7*d.*" by means of substantially the same false pretences.

The evidence showed that these two men, who obviously were dishonest, induced bookmakers to bet with them by representing that they were commission agents acting on behalf of a large number of workmen who were making small bets on various races, whereas, in fact, they were making bets in considerable sums of money for themselves alone. The main question which arises on all the counts except count 1, in respect of which there are particular circumstances, can be stated in this way. Does a man who induces a bookmaker to bet with him by making false pretences as to his identity or as to the capacity in which he is making the bets obtain money by false pretences if he is fortunate enough to back a winning horse and so receives money from the bookmaker ? In the opinion of the court it is impossible to say that there was here an obtaining of the money by the false pretences which were alleged, because the money was obtained, not by reason of the fact that the accused persons falsely pretended that they were somebody or acting in some capacity which they were not, but because they backed a winning horse as a result of which the bookmaker paid them the sums obtained. No doubt, the bookmaker might never have opened an account with these men if he had known the true facts, but we must distinguish between a contributing cause and the effective cause which led the bookmaker to pay the money, namely, the fact that these men had backed a winning horse. It is true that in R. v. Leon (1) it was held that, as bets on horse races are null and void, a charge will not lie against a backer for fraudulently obtaining credit from the bookmaker because the credit he obtains is in respect of a null and void bet, but, granted here that originally these two men induced the bookmaker to bet with them by means of a false pretence, that false pretence was not the false pretence which led to the payment of the money. What led to the payment of the money was the fact that the men backed a winning horse. They had put themselves in the position that if they backed the horse and lost they had to pay the bookmaker and if they backed the horse and won they were entitled to receive the money. In the opinion of the court, therefore, it cannot be said that the money was obtained by false pretences within the meaning of the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 32 (1).

Counsel for the Crown has called the attention of the court to certain cases, the nearest one to the present being R. v. Button (2). In that case the accused, by representing that he was a person of the name of Sims, who was a moderate performer in athletic sports and was not known as a likely winner of races, managed to obtain from the committee of some athletic sports which were to be held at Lincoln a substantial start in a race. He was, in fact, a man who had won a great many races, and, if the truth had been known, he would have received either no start at all or a very moderate one. The court held that by falsely representing himself to be someone he was not and thereby obtaining a substantial start, he obtained the prize by false pretences because the pretence in question was a matter directly connected with the winning or not winning of the prize. By the false pretence he obtained for himself a winning chance which otherwise he would not have had and thereby enabled himself to win the race. In our view, that case on the facts is clearly distinguishable from the present case.

With regard to the charge of conspiracy the facts were these. Having already made the false pretence with regard to their identity and the capacity in which they were betting, the two men backed a horse that won a race. Revell then went to collect the money, but the bookmaker had a suspicion that all was not right and he was unwilling to pay over the money without obtaining further assurances that Revell was the man he pretended to be. Revell repeated the false pretence and went so far as to tell the bookmaker, Gamble, that he could telephone to a certain number which would be the number of the aerodrome where these people were supposed to be working and get confirmation of the story that Revell had told him. All this time the appellant was loitering in the neighbourhood of the telephone kiosk which bore the telephone number given to Gamble, so that he could answer the telephone if the call came through. That shows these two men were conspiring together. They conspired, in the first place, to tell lies to the bookmaker, and, even without the evidence about the telephone kiosk, there was abundant evidence on which the jury could find that Revell, in going to collect the money and repeating the story, was acting in pursuance of the conspiracy. Therefore, what he did was evidence against his co-conspirator. It is true that there was substantially no direction to the jury on this point or on those lines, but both the prisoners gave evidence admitting the telling of the lies to the bookmakers and the putting on of bets in assumed names. Therefore, the absence of any direction could not have made any difference because no reasonable jury could have come to any other conclusion on the evidence of the prisoners themselves than that they had conspired together to cheat the bookmaker of this sum of money. Therefore, with regard to count 1 the conviction of the appellant must stand. With regard to the other counts against the appellant, the conviction must be quashed. Having quashed the conviction on several of the counts, we think that a reduction in sentence must be made, and we reduce the appellant's sentence to one of twelve months' imprisonment.

Sentence reduced.

By pt. II of the National Health Service Act, 1946, which came into force on July 5, 1948, hospitals and their property were taken over by the State. By s. 6 (1) of the Act: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister . . . all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital . . . and in . . . movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section." By s. 7 (1): "Where any voluntary hospital to which the last foregoing section applies is, before the appointed day, designated by the Minister under this Part of this Act as a teaching hospital . . . all endowments of the hospital held immediately before the appointed day shall on that day . . . be transferred to and vest in the board of governors constituted under the following provisions of this Part of this Act for the teaching hospital." Section 7 (10) defined "endowment" in relation to a voluntary hospital as "property held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, being A property of the following descriptions (a) interests in or attaching to land . . . (b) shares, stocks . . . and other securities, and any other personal property held by way of an investment; (c) money, including any credit in a banking account; (d) rights under any bill of exchange, promissory note or gratuitous covenant for the payment of money: Provided that an equitable interest held for the purposes of a voluntary B hospital in trust property in which there are other equitable interests shall not be deemed to be an endowment of that hospital." By s. 79 the word "property" included rights. By s. 60 (1): "Where property, other than property transferred to the Minister or to the board of governors of a teaching hospital or to a hospital management committee under s. 6 or s. 7 of this Act, is held on trust immediately before the appointed C day, and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies, the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purpose D of making payments, whether of capital or income (a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital . . . to the board of governors of that teaching hospital." By reg. 30 of the National Health Service (Apportionment and Transfer) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 888), made under ss. 6 (5), 7 (9), and 9 (8) of the Act: "Any question as to whether any property or liability will be or has been transferred under E the provisions of pt. II of the Act relating to the transfer of property and liabilities, or as to whether any property or liability falls to be apportioned under these regulations or as to the person to whom it will be or has been transferred shall, in default of agreement, be determined by arbitration."

By her will, dated June 18, 1948, the testatrix gave her property to her trustee on the statutory trusts for realisation and directed him to F divide her residuary estate into eight equal shares and to pay one such share to the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) and another to the Cancer Research Institute, which was owned and controlled by the hospital, both the hospital and the institute being charitable institutions. The testatrix died on June 23, 1948, and probate of the will was obtained on July 31, 1948 (i.e., after the National Health Service Act, 1946, had G come into force). By the National Health Service (Designation of Teaching Hospitals (No. 2)) Order, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 979), made under s. 11 (8) of the Act, the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) was designated as a teaching hospital, and from July 5, 1948, the affairs of the hospital and the institute were conducted by a board of governors. It was contended by the board that the shares of the residue given by the will to the hospital and the H institute vested in them under s. 7 (1) of the Act, or, alternatively, that the trustee was required to apply the shares in paying the capital and income thereof to them under s. 60 (1). The Minister of Health claimed the shares under s. 6 (1).

Held: (i) the jurisdiction of the court was not ousted by the provisions for arbitration in the Act and regulations made under it, as the subject-matter of an arbitration under the regulations had to be fact and not law, and, if and so far as reg. 30 of the National Health Service (Apportionment and Transfer) Regulations, 1948, purported to refer to arbitration the type of question the court had to consider, it was ultra vires.

(ii) while the estate remained undistributed, the interest of the hospital and the institute under the will was "an equitable interest held for the purposes of a voluntary hospital in trust property in which there are other equitable interests" within the proviso to s. 7 (10) of the Act, and therefore, this interest was excluded from the category of "endowments," and the shares did not vest in the board of governors under s. 7 (1).

(iii) an interest in an unadministered residue was not a right acquired for the purpose of carrying on the business of the hospital, and, therefore, the shares did not vest in the Minister of Health under s. 6 (1).

(iv) section 60 (1) did not apply, as its language was wholly inappropriate to the gifts in question.

(v) the fact that, under s. 78 (1) (c), the charitable institutions had ceased to exist on July 5, 1948, could not bring about a lapse, as they were still in existence when the testatrix died: Re Slevin ([1891] 2 Ch. 236) followed; and, therefore, the next of kin had no rights, and the gifts must be applied by Sign Manual under the principles applicable thereto.

Adjourned Summons to determine inter alia whether on the true construction of the will of the testatrix and of the National Health Service Act, 1946, (a) the right to receive shares of the residuary estate of the testatrix bequeathed by her will to the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) and the Cancer Research Institute (i) was vested in the Minister of Health under s. 6 of the Act, or (ii) was vested in the board of governors under s. 7 of the Act; or (b) the trustee of the will was required to apply the shares in paying the capital and income thereof to the board of governors under s. 60 of the Act; or (c) the shares (i) were held on some other, and, if so, what, charitable trusts, or (ii) were undisposed of and passed as on the testatrix's intestacy. Harman, J., held that the jurisdiction of the court was not ousted by the provision in the Act for arbitration. He further held that neither s. 6, nor s. 7, nor s. 60 applied to the legacies in question, and that they were outside the scope of the Act, but that there was no lapse as the charitable institutions to which the legacies had been given were in existence when the testatrix died, and, accordingly, he directed that the legacies be applied by Sign Manual under the principles applicable thereto. The facts and the relevant sections of the Act appear in the judgment.

By reg. 30 of the National Health Service (Apportionment and Transfer) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 888), (made under ss. 6 (5), 7 (9) and 9 (8) of the Act):

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. Mabel Alicia Kellner made her will on June 18, 1948. She appointed the plaintiff, Alfred Blundell, a solicitor, to be her executor and trustee. She bequeathed a number of pecuniary legacies, and devised and bequeathed all the rest of her property to her trustee on the statutory trusts for realisation and directed him to stand possessed of her residuary estate on trust to divide it equally between eight well-known charitable institutions, two parts going respectively to the Cancer Research Institute and the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), Fulham Road. The testatrix died on June 23, 1948, and at that date no difficulty or doubt could have arisen about the destination of the two shares of residue to which I have referred. The Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) was the well-known hospital carried on in the Fulham Road under that name. It was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1910. Besides the hospital it owned and controlled a research institute housed in the old Freemasons Hospital in the Fulham Road. This was conducted under its own directors and staff and was commonly known as the Cancer Research Institute. It was manifestly the object of the testatrix's bounty to the extent of one-eighth of her residue. Probate of the will was obtained on July 31, 1948, but before that event there was brought into force, by Order in Council, pt. II of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the appointed day being July 5, 1948. Under this Part of the Act, broadly speaking, the hospitals of the country and their property were taken over by the State. The control of hospitals differs according to whether they were or were not designated by the Minister under s. 11 (8) of the Act as teaching hospitals. Such a designation was, in fact, made in the case of the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) by the National Health Service (Designation of Teaching Hospitals (No. 2)) Order, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 979), and, as a result, a board of governors constituted in accordance with sched. III, pt. III, to the Act has been, since the appointed day, conducting the affairs of the hospital and of the Cancer Research Institute in obedience to s. 12 (3) and s. 16 (2) of the Act. The board is the first defendant to the summons and claims the benefit of the testatrix's bounty.

Bequests of legacies or shares of residue in favour of hospitals are, or were until the springs of charity were dried by a crippling taxation, the commonest form of charitable bounty, and I confess that I approached the problem here posed in the confident expectation that I should find direct guidance in the Act as to the destination of such gifts. It was, indeed, with some surprise that I heard that conflicting claims were preferred by the board of governors, by the Minister of Health, by the Attorney-General, and by the next of kin. My attention was drawn by counsel, section by section, to the provisions of the Act, and I read them with a bewilderment which ripened finally into despair when the conclusion was forced on me, from which I see no escape, that by some mischance the legislature has so framed the clauses of this Act as to leave outside it charitable legacies of the nature here in question. The Act in this respect is almost a miracle of ineptitude. I propose to examine it to show how I have felt obliged to come to the melancholy conclusion to which I have referred and to hold that this is, indeed, an extraordinary instance of casus omissus.

Before I deal with the sections under which the conflicting claims are made, I must dispose of a suggestion, properly made to me, that the Act has provided a statutory form of arbitration for the resolution of the type of questions with which I am confronted and has thus ousted the jurisdiction of the court. That an arbitration clause in a statute may have this effect is illustrated by Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Ltd. v. Manchester Ship Canal Co. (1). It would be a further surprise to find that the legislature has, by what would seem to be an inadvertence, shut out the hospitals from access to the courts on questions A of construction of the Act, but that result, if it emerges from the language used, must be accepted. Part II of the Act, with which I am here concerned, contains a number of provisions for arbitration. Thus ss. 6 and 7, which are the main sections effectuating the transfer of hospital assets to the State, both contain arbitration provisions, but both of these, broadly speaking, are framed to decide questions of apportionment between assets partly transferred and B partly not, and they have no bearing on the present question. Section 9, however, which is described as containing "Supplementary provisions relating to transfer of hospital property and liabilities," contains the following sub-section :

> "(8) Regulations may make such provision supplementary to or consequential on the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act relating to C the transfer of property and liabilities as appears to the Minister to be necessary or expedient, and in particular, but without prejudice to the generality of this sub-section, regulations may provide (a) for the determination by arbitration, in default of agreement, of any question arising as to whether any property or liability will be or has been transferred under the said provisions or as to the person to whom it will be or has D been transferred."

The language of s. 9 (8) (a) seems appropriate to the present question, but the provision to be made by the regulations must be "supplementary to or consequential on" ss. 6 and 7, thus limiting questions which can be dealt with by regulation to matters ancillary to the sections. This presupposes that the property in question is of a nature coming within the transfer clauses if E owned by a hospital of one of the kinds indicated. It does not, in my judgment, extend to questions of the meaning and effect of the sections themselves. In other words, the subject-matter of an arbitration under the regulations must be fact and not law. I hold, therefore, that the jurisdiction of the court is not ousted, and I need not consider the National Health Service (Apportionment and Transfer) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 888) made by the F Minister under ss. 6 (5), 7 (9) and 9 (8) of the Act, beyond saying that reg. 30 of these regulations, if and so far as it purports to refer to arbitration the type of question which I have here to determine, is ultra vires.

I now turn back to the main question and first deal with s. 7 on which the first defendants, the board of governors, mainly rely. Section 7 (1) is in the following terms :

G

> "Where any voluntary hospital to which the last foregoing section applies is, before the appointed day, designated by the Minister under this Part of this Act as a teaching hospital or is one of a group of hospitals so designated, all endowments of the hospital held immediately before the appointed day shall on that day, by virtue of this Act, be transferred to and vest in the board of governors constituted under the following H provisions of this Part of this Act for the teaching hospital".

If, then, this be an "endowment," the first defendants are right. That word is explained in s. 7 (10) in these terms :

> "In this section the expression 'endowment,' in relation to a voluntary hospital, means property held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, being property of the following descriptions (a) interests in or attaching to land . . . (b) > shares, stocks, bonds, debentures and other securities, and any other personal property held by way of an investment; (c) money, including any credit in a banking account; (d) rights under any bill of exchange, promissory note or gratuitous covenant for the payment of money: Provided that an equitable interest held for the purposes of a voluntary hospital in trust property in which there are other equitable interests shall not be deemed to be an endowment of that hospital." A

By s. 79, unless the context otherwise requires, the word "property" includes rights. Now the rights of the residuary legatees are rights to have the estate of the testatrix administered according to law, either by the personal representatives or by the court, and on completion of the administration to have the balance remaining in the executors' hands distributed in due proportions. The residuary legatees, while the estate remains undistributed, have no right B to any particular asset or item of property, but merely an equitable interest in the estate of the nature I have mentioned. It seems to me that this is "an equitable interest held for the purposes of a voluntary hospital in trust property in which there are other equitable interests," and, if so, the proviso to s. 7 (10) clearly excludes this interest from the category of endowments. Even if that be not so, I cannot find any words in s. 7 (10) which could cover C this share. It was suggested that this was "personal property held by way of an investment," but that it clearly is not, and there are no other words which are even faintly appropriate. It follows that I must hold that s. 7 (1) has no application. Before leaving this section, I should add, perhaps, that it contains one extremely odd feature in that provision is made for an endowment given after the passing of the Act and before the appointed day in the D case of a non-teaching hospital, but omits a similar provision in the case of a teaching hospital. I cannot understand this caprice, but it is irrelevant, as I must hold this not to be an endowment.

I turn back, therefore, to s. 6 under which the Minister of Health prefers his claim. If this succeeds the money will go to the Exchequer under s. 52 (2) of the Act. Section 6 provides: E

> "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital or used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and in equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, F being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital . . . and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part G thereof, but not including any endowment . . . within the meaning of the next following section . . ."

The last words are satisfied if I am right about s. 7. Section 6 (2) deals with the transfer of the property of hospitals vested in a local authority, but for some inscrutable reason entirely different language is used, though one would suppose that property of the same nature was being transferred in each case. H It, therefore, affords no help. Section 6 (1) starts by transferring interests in what are called by the inappropriate word "premises," by which I suppose immovable property to be meant. The section proceeds to deal secondly with movable property, and thirdly with rights, which include rights acquired solely for the purpose of carrying on the business of the hospital, but not including an endowment within s. 7. It was suggested to me that, if s. 7 did not apply, the words of s. 6 (1) which I have just quoted do catch this interest, but I cannot think that an interest in an unadministered residue can be described even in this Act as a right acquired for the purpose of carrying on the business of the hospital. Accordingly, I reject this suggestion.

Further, it was suggested that, if neither s. 6 nor s. 7 embraced the interest in question, it was yet caught by s. 60. This section is to be found in pt. VI of the Act, which is described as "General," and in a fasciculus of sections A described as "Administrative Provisions." The side-note to s. 60 reads as follows:

> "Power of trustees to make payments to regional hospital boards and boards of governors."

This section, therefore, may be described as tabula in naufragio. It would B clearly rescue the first defendants only by an accident. The section provides:

> "(1) Where property, other than property transferred to the Minister or to the board of governors of a teaching hospital or to a hospital management committee under s. 6 or s. 7 of this Act, is held on trust immediately before the appointed day, and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply C any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies, the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purpose of making payments, whether of capital or income (a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital or included D in a group of hospitals so designated, to the board of governors of that teaching hospital . . ."

The context of this section requires that the word "property" should not here include rights, for that which is dealt with is something to be applied for the benefit of (among others) a board of governors. The rights vested in the board of governors here cannot be applied by someone else for their E benefit. In this section, therefore, the expression "the trust property" means the residue of the estate, and the question is whether the terms of the trust instrument (i.e., the will) require the trustees (i.e., the plaintiff) to apply a part of the capital for the purposes of the Cancer Hospital. In my judgment, this language is wholly inappropriate, and the section has nothing to do with the case.

F What, then, is to happen to this bequest? Is it undisposed of and payable, therefore, to the next of kin? I cannot think so. When the testatrix died, there was in existence a charity identifiable as the object of her bounty, and capable of taking advantage of her bequest. The fact that this charity has ceased to exist, as, in fact, it has under s. 78 (1) (c) of the Act, cannot bring about a lapse, on the ordinary principle that there can be no lapse where the G legatee survives the testator. The principle is clearly stated in Re Slevin (2). Accordingly, I must hold that the next of kin have no rights, and that the bequest should be applied by Sign Manual under the principles applicable thereto.

This leaves the question of costs. This is not a case where a difficulty has been caused by the language which the testatrix has used. It is true that she H made her will after the passing of the Act of 1946, but, though ignorance of the law is no excuse, there is no presumption that a citizen knows the law. Accordingly, I am not bound to attribute a knowledge of pt. II of the Act to the testatrix or her advisers. The difficulty has been brought about by the astonishing ineptitude with which pt. II is drawn, and I see no reason why the charities who take the other six-eighths of the residue should pay for the omissions of the legislature. I may add that this summons was taken out at the suggestion of the Ministry of Health, which confessed itself unable to understand the Act, and desired its elucidation for its own convenience. I do not think that I ought to order the Minister to pay the costs, but I shall order that they be paid as between solicitor and client out of the two-eighths of the residue as to which alone these questions have arisen.

Declaration accordingly. Costs to be paid as between solicitor and client out of the shares of residue concerned.

MARRIAGE v. EAST NORFOLK RIVERS CATCHMENT BOARD.

[King's Bench Division (Byrne, J.), May 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 12, 1949.] C

Land Drainage—Catchment board—Cleansing watercourse—Damage to plaintiff's bridge—Dredgings deposited on bank—Diversion of flood waters—Action for nuisance by plaintiff—Competence—Land Drainage Act, 1930 (c. 44), s. 34 (1), (3), s. 38 (1).

Public Authority—Limitation of action—Catchment board—Cleansing watercourse—Dredgings deposited on bank—Plaintiff's bridge destroyed three years later owing to diversion of flood waters—Date on which cause of action accrued—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 21 (1). D

By the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 34 (1), a catchment board were empowered to maintain and improve existing works and to construct new works, and by s. 38 (1) they were allowed to deposit on the banks of a watercourse any matter removed in the course of dredging that watercourse. By s. 34 (3): "Where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by a drainage board of any of its powers under this section, the Board shall be liable to make full compensation to the injured person, and in case of dispute the amount of the compensation shall be determined in the manner in which disputed compensation for land is required to be determined by the Lands Clauses Acts." E F

In pursuance of their statutory powers a catchment board deposited on the south bank of a river dredgings taken from the river, thereby raising the bank from one to two feet, this work being completed on Jan. 6, 1944. In December, 1946, the river flooded, and, as the flood waters were prevented by the deposited dredgings from escaping over the south bank as they had formerly done, they ran through a by-pass on the north of the river and swept away a bridge leading across it to a mill. On Nov. 5, 1947, the owner of the bridge issued the writ in an action for nuisance against the catchment board. G

Held: (i) where a plaintiff had a legal right of action but for the powers which the catchment board had under s. 34 (1) he had sustained an "injury" within the meaning of s. 34 (3), and no action based on nuisance would lie against the Board, the plaintiff's only remedy being to claim compensation under sub-s. (3). H

(ii) where there was a dispute with regard to compensation, the function of the arbitrator was to determine not merely the quantum of compensation, but also whether there was an injury which would have given a right of action but for the statute.

(iii) even if an action for nuisance did lie, the Board were not the owners of the land on which they had deposited the dredgings ; in view of the provisions of s. 38 (1) of the Act there was no duty on them to remove the dredgings and their only wrongful act was the actual depositing ; that was completed on Jan. 6, 1944, and so the cause of action accrued on that day : Nicholls v. Ely Beet Sugar Factory, Ltd. ([1936] Ch. 343) and A Harrop v. Hirst (1868) (L.R. 4 Exch. 43), applied ; and, therefore, there was no continuing act, neglect or default within the meaning of the proviso to the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), and the action, being against a public authority, was barred under that sub-section since it was not brought within one year of the date on which the cause of action accrued.

E ACTION for damages for nuisance.

The plaintiff was a miller who owned Limbourne Mill on the River Waveney at Wortwell, near Harleston, in the county of Norfolk, and also a bridge leading to the mill across a by-pass channel on the north side of the river below a weir. The defendants were the East Norfolk Rivers Catchment Board, a F public authority whose area included the River Waveney. In December, 1946, when the river was in flood, the plaintiff's bridge collapsed and BYRNE, J., now found as a fact that the collapse occurred because, from Oct. 1, 1943, until Jan. 6, 1944, the catchment board, while engaged in dredging the river, had deposited the dredgings on the south bank, thereby raising it from one to two feet, with the result that the flood waters were unable to escape over the south bank, as they had done in previous years, and ran instead through G the by-pass channel, scouring the channel and undermining the buttresses of the bridge. The plaintiff claimed damages for nuisance in the loss of the bridge. The catchment board contended that the plaintiff's sole remedy was a claim for compensation under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 34 (3), and that, in any event, the action was statute-barred under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), as it was an action against a public authority commenced more than H one year after the cause of action arose. BYRNE, J., gave judgment for the catchment board on both issues.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12. BYRNE, J., [after stating the facts and his findings thereon] : I now turn to the law. This action is based on nuisance, and it is contended on behalf of the catchment board that the action is misconceived. It is said that no such action lies against the Board, and that the plaintiff's only remedy is to seek compensation under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 34 (3). By s. 34 (1) the Board have power to maintain and improve existing works, and to construct new works. The sub-section provides that the Board

> " . . . shall have power (a) to maintain existing works, that is to say, to cleanse, repair or otherwise maintain in a due state of efficiency any existing watercourse or drainage work : (b) to improve any existing works, that is to say, to deepen, widen, straighten or otherwise improve any existing watercourse, or remove mill dams, weirs or other obstructions to watercourses, or raise, widen, or otherwise improve any existing drainage work : (c) to construct new works, that is to say, to make any new watercourse or drainage work or erect any machinery or do any other act not hereinbefore referred to, required for the drainage of the area comprised within their district."

The Board are, therefore, plainly given power to violate private rights, and, indeed, without that power, the statute would be rendered nugatory. Section 34 (3) provides :

> " Where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by a drainage board of any of its powers under this section, the Board shall be liable to make full compensation to the injured person, and in case of dispute the amount of the compensation shall be determined in the manner in which disputed compensation for land is required to be determined by the Lands Clauses Acts."

I take the word " injury " in that sub-section to connote a legal right of action but for the powers which the catchment board have under this statute, and, in my view, that sub-section means that, if that which is complained of would have been actionable at common law but for the statute, there is a right to compensation.

The sub-section goes on to provide that :

> " . . . in case of dispute the amount of the compensation shall be determined in the manner in which disputed compensation for land is required to be determined by the Lands Clauses Acts."

It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiff that that sub-section is concerned only with the quantum of compensation, but in reply to that argument Rhodes v. Airedale Drainage Comrs. (1) and Hall v. Bristol Corpn. (2) were cited. Those cases appear to me to establish the proposition that, in a case in which there is a dispute with regard to compensation, an arbitrator is to determine, first, whether there was injury which would have given a right of action but for the statute, and, secondly, if there was, the appropriate amount of compensation.

Section 38 (1) provides :

> " A drainage board, without making payment therefor or giving compensation in respect thereof, may appropriate and dispose of any shingle, sand, clay, gravel, stone, rock or other matter removed in the course of the execution of any work for widening, deepening or dredging any watercourse, and may deposit any matter so removed on the banks of the watercourse or use it in any other manner for the maintenance or improvement of those banks or for the purposes of the execution of any other work which the drainage board have power to execute."

The effect of ss. 34 and 38, in my view, is as follows :—(i) that the Board had power to do that which is complained of in this case, i.e., to raise the height of the south bank of the river by placing thereon the dredgings from the river ; (ii) that, assuming that the effect of what the Board did was to cause damage to the plaintiff which would have been actionable at common law but for the statutory authority conferred on the Board, the plaintiff's only remedy is to claim compensation under s. 34 (3), the amount of compensation, in case of dispute, being fixed by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Acts. A riparian owner is entitled to erect or heighten the banks on his land, although the effect of doing so is to divert flood water from his land to the land of another person, and the person to whose land the flood water is diverted has no cause of action at common law: see Gerrard v. Crowe (3) and R. v. Pagham, Sussex, Sewers Comrs. (4). By s. 34 of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, a catchment board are entitled to do the same thing without any liability for damage caused. On the other hand, if what was done can be regarded as an interference with a regular flood channel which formed part of the bed of the river, then in the case of a riparian owner such action would render him liable at common law: see Menzies v. Breadalbane (5) and Bickett v. Morris (6). On the facts I have come to the conclusion that the catchment board, by their act, diverted the ordinary flood course of the river, and thus did an act which, had it been done by a riparian owner, would have rendered that riparian owner liable to an action, but, having regard to the terms of the statute, I am of opinion that no action based on nuisance will lie against the Board, and that the plaintiff's only remedy is under s. 34 (3) of the Land Drainage Act, 1930.

Assuming, however, that I am wrong about that, and that an action based on nuisance will lie against the catchment board, the remaining question is whether this action is barred by the Limitation Act, 1939. Section 21 (1) of that Act provides that the action must be commenced within one year of the cause of action, and then there is a proviso:

> " . . . that where the act, neglect or default is a continuing one, no cause of action in respect thereof shall be deemed to have accrued . . . until the act, neglect or default has ceased."

The wrongful act alleged here is the depositing of dredgings on the south bank of the river. That work was completed on Jan. 6, 1944, and thus that was the day on which the cause of action arose: see Nicholls v. Ely Beet Sugar Factory, Ltd. (7) and Harrop v. Hirst (8). No positive act is alleged after that date, and the writ was not issued until Nov. 5, 1947. The catchment board were not the owners of the land on which the dredgings were placed by them under their statutory powers. Hence the only thing that can be said against the Board after Jan. 6, 1944, is that they did not exercise the powers which they had under s. 34 (1) to remove the dredgings. In my view, however, there was no duty on them to do so, and thus it follows that this action is barred, in my view, by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). Thus, although the conduct of this catchment board leaves, in my opinion, much to be desired, for those reasons this action fails, and there must be judgment for the Board.

KITCHEN'S TRUSTEE v. MADDERS AND ANOTHER.

[Chancery Division (Harman, J.), May 11, 12, 1949.].

Bankruptcy—Set off—Set off of amount of damages recovered from bankrupt against claim by trustee in bankruptcy for rent—Rent accrued before and after bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 31.

A. was the owner of a hotel which she mortgaged to a building society, the mortgage deed providing that A.'s powers of leasing were to be exercised only with the consent of the building society. In April, 1947, A. orally agreed to sell the goodwill of the hotel and its contents to M., who also agreed to take a lease of the hotel for a term of seven years. M. paid £2,000 down and gave A. a bill of sale on the furniture for the balance of the purchase money. On May 9, 1947, A., without the consent of the building society, purported to grant to M. a lease of the hotel for seven years at a rent of £500 a year payable quarterly. On going into possession M. found that he had been defrauded by A., and on Aug. 11, 1947, he issued a writ for damages for fraud. Thereafter M. paid no rent. On Dec. 9, 1947, A. became bankrupt and at that date two quarters' rent was owing by M. On Jan. 2, 1948, M. recovered judgment in default of defence against A. for damages for fraud (the amount to be assessed) and for the setting aside of the bill of sale. In August, 1948, A.'s trustee in bankruptcy obtained a stay of M.'s action, and M. issued a summons to have the stay removed. On Oct. 15, 1948, an order was made removing the stay on M.'s undertaking not to prove his claim in A.'s bankruptcy. Subsequently, the building society issued an originating summons for foreclosure. After the issue of the writ in the present action by the trustee against M. for the two instalments of rent which had accrued due prior to the date of bankruptcy and for three instalments which had accrued thereafter up to the date of the writ, the building society amended this originating summons by asking for possession of the hotel and striking out all other claims. It was common ground in the present action that that summons could not be proceeded with because the relief asked for could in the circumstances (the defendants being treated in the proceedings as strangers and not tenants) only be given in an action started by writ. On Nov. 4, 1948, M.'s damages for A.'s fraud were assessed at £5,500 and M. now claimed to set off those damages against the trustee's claim.

Held : (i) the instalments of rent accruing after the date of A.'s bankruptcy were never due to A., and there was, therefore, no mutuality and there could be no set off.

Alloway v. Steere (1882) (10 Q.B.D. 22), applied.

(ii) as regards the instalments due before the bankruptcy, M. was precluded by his undertaking from proving in the bankruptcy in respect of the damages for fraud and, therefore, could not bring himself within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 31 (which provides in effect that for set off to apply there must be mutual dealings between the debtor (A.) and any person proving or claiming to prove a debt under a receiving order), and there could be no set off.

Jack v. Kipping (1882) (9 Q.B.D. 113), distinguished.

(iii) the defendants were not entitled to protection against the possibility of having to pay rent twice, viz., to both the trustee and the building society, because, since the building society's action for possession was bound to fail and they had not otherwise recognised the lease or demanded possession or required the rent to be paid to them, they had not intervened to an extent which demanded that such protection be given.

ACTION by a trustee in bankruptcy to recover arrears of rent.

The defendants' claim to set off damages awarded them against the bankrupt for fraud was rejected by HARMAN, J., who gave judgment for the trustee. The facts appear in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

C Aronson, K.C., for the trustee in bankruptcy.
Michael Browne, for the defendants.

HARMAN, J. : This is an action by the trustee in bankruptcy of one Hilda Kitchen on a specially endorsed writ for arrears of rent against the defendants who are admittedly in possession of a property called " Roslyn Private Hotel " at Blackpool under a lease created by the bankrupt for a term of seven D years from May 9, 1947, at a rent of £500 a year payable quarterly. Before the date of the lease the bankrupt had mortgaged the hotel to a building society, and the lease is said to have been granted without the consent of the mortgagees, the leasing power of the mortgagor having been limited by the mortgage document to leases granted with the mortgagees' consent.

The facts are not easy to ascertain, but, so far as I can make them out, relations E started with an oral contract made in April, 1947, by the defendants in this action agreeing with the bankrupt to buy from her the goodwill and certain of the contents of the Roslyn Private Hotel for £5,000, and to take a lease of the premises from her for seven years, which part of the contract was carried out by the lease of May 9, 1947. It appears that the defendants paid £2,000 down, and gave a bill of sale on the furniture for the balance of £3,000. It also appears F that, having gone into possession, they discovered that they had been defrauded by the bankrupt, and on Aug. 11, 1947, they issued a writ in the King's Bench Division claiming damages for fraud. In those circumstances, though they remain in possession of the hotel, they have not paid any rent. On Dec. 9, 1947, the bankrupt went bankrupt. At that time there were two quarters' rent owing by the defendants to the bankrupt under the lease. On Jan. 2, G 1948, the defendants recovered judgment against the bankrupt for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, the damages to be assessed, and they got the bill of sale on the furniture set aside. They obtained that judgment on motion in default of defence and without the learned judge taking any notice of the bankruptcy which had already supervened. In August, 1948, the trustee obtained a stay of that action in the usual way, and the defendants took out H a summons in the action to have the stay removed. Immediately after the first hearing of that summons, the writ in the present action was issued by the trustee for the two quarters' rent due before the bankruptcy supervened and the three quarters' rent thereafter down to the date when the writ was issued, which was Aug. 19, 1948. On Oct. 15, 1948, the judge in chambers made an order in the King's Bench action removing the stay, but he made it on the terms that : " . . . the plaintiffs by their counsel undertaking not to prove their claim the subject-matter of this action in the bankruptcy."

So the price they paid for getting the stay removed was their undertaking not to prove their claim in the bankruptcy. I take that at its face value. Shortly after that the matter was further complicated by the mortgagees issuing an originating summons for foreclosure. That it was an action for foreclosure is clear because the second and third mortgagees were joined as defendants to the proceedings. The mortgagees obtained, I suppose, leave to exercise that remedy before they started their action—at least, nobody A has taken any objection. So far as I can make out, the mortgagees in that action did not recognise the lease or the defendants as tenants under it. On Nov. 4, 1948, the registrar at Blackpool assessed the damages for the fraudulent misrepresentation by the bankrupt at some £5,500 so that the defendants' claim was quantified. This action now comes on for trial, the defendants having obtained leave to defend. On Feb. 8, 1949, after delivery of defence B in this action, the mortgagees amended their proceedings by asking for possession of the mortgaged premises, and striking out all other claims. It is clear that that claim cannot succeed for it is a claim for possession against the defendants treating them as strangers and not as tenants, and must be made in an action started by writ. It is admitted that the summons which is still on foot must be abandoned. C

The defendants here take two different points. First, having against the bankrupt a claim for £5,500 for damages, they ask that they may set that off against the accruing claims for rent under the lease. It is admitted on behalf of the trustee that, apart from the undertaking to which I have referred, that would be a good claim so far as concerns the two instalments of rent due before the bankruptcy. The authority for that proposition is Jack v. Kipping (1), D of which I need only read the headnote :

> "A claim for unliquidated damages for a fraudulent representation made by a bankrupt on the sale of a chattel is within the mutual credit clause (s. 39) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and consequently may be set off in an action brought by the trustee for the unpaid price—such fraudulent representation not being a mere personal tort, but a breach of the obligation arising out of the contract of sale." E

Except that the damage has been quantified here, that exactly applies. As to those two instalments, therefore, the trustee relies merely on the undertaking. As to the instalments of rent which have accrued due between the bankruptcy and the date of the writ, the trustee says that there was no mutuality. He F says that this was not money which was ever due to the bankrupt at all because, at the date of the bankruptcy, the rent had not accrued due and instalments of rent due in the future are not moneys that are due to the bankrupt at the date of the bankruptcy. These sums became due, he says, to the trustee as landlord and, therefore, there was no mutuality. That point, it seems to me, is a good one. It is said by counsel for the defendants that that is not right G because once it is admitted that there was a right of set off and the bankruptcy supervened, the moneys later accruing due can be treated as an addition to one side of the account which has to be taken where there is a set off. I agree that, if these were moneys due at the date of the bankruptcy, but payable later, that would be right. I think that that is illustrated by Re Daintrey (2) where there was a contract between two firms of solicitors under which, at the H date of the bankruptcy in question, a sum of money, then unquantified, was owing but payable at a future date, and when the future date came it was held to be a good subject-matter of set off. That, however, does not seem to me to apply to rent which had not accrued due at the date when the bankruptcy supervened and was, therefore, not a debt due to the bankrupt at all. On the other hand, it does seem to me that Alloway v. Steere (3) is in point. The headnote to that case is :

> "A debtor, who was tenant from year to year of a farm upon the terms that, at the expiration of the tenancy, he should be paid by the landlord allowances for tillages and cultivation according to the custom of the country, filed a petition for liquidation of his affairs under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and a trustee was appointed, who did not disclaim the tenancy, but carried on the business of the farm for the benefit of the creditors until the tenancy A was determined by notice to quit. The debtor's estate was sufficient to indemnify the trustee against any personal liability in respect of the tenancy. In an action to recover the value of tillages and cultivation by the trustee during his tenancy, according to the custom :—Held, that the landlord was not entitled to set off rent, accrued due from the debtor before the liquidation proceedings, against the trustee's claim."

B That seems to me to be almost exactly the converse of the present case. I hold, therefore, that there can be no set off as to the three instalments of rent accruing due since the bankruptcy.

As to the instalments before the bankruptcy, counsel for the trustee, as I have said, was driven to rely on the undertaking. The right of set off in bankruptcy is the creature of statute and arises under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, C s. 31, under the terms of which the persons between whom there must be mutual dealings are the debtor, on the one side, and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under the receiving order, on the other. The present defendants, having regard to their undertaking, cannot either prove or claim to prove a debt under the receiving order, and, therefore, they do not come within s. 31. To that argument I see no answer, and, therefore, I am of opinion that there D is no right of set off either for the pre-bankruptcy or the post-bankruptcy amount of rent.

A further point taken by the defendants, raises a most difficult question. They say : "We are in peril of having to pay the rent twice. You, the trustee, claim through the mortgagor and the mortgagor may at any moment be put out by the mortgagees, and then she would have no further right to sue for the E rent." The Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 98 (1), provides :

> "A mortgagor for the time being entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits . . . thereof, may sue for such possession, or for the recovery of such rents or profits . . ."

Counsel for the defendants agrees that the trustee is in the shoes of the mortgagor, but he says he is not entitled to sue because notice has been given by the F mortgagees of their intention to take possession. He relies on Moss v. Gallimore (4), which is still good law and appears in SMITH'S LEADING CASES. The sidenote in Moss v. Gallimore (4) is this :

> "A mortgagee, after giving notice of the mortgage to the tenant in possession under a lease prior to the mortgage, is entitled to the rent in arrear G at the time of the notice, as well as to what accrues afterwards . . ."

If there has been an effective notice by the mortgagees, they can give a good receipt for the accruing rent, and, therefore, it is said that the defendants are in peril of having to pay the rent twice.

The lease, however, is not being recognised by the mortgagees. If the mortgagees had given notice to the defendants, as tenants, to pay the rent to them, H the trustee, claiming through the mortgagor, would clearly be out of court. If the mortgagees had made an unequivocal entry into possession or issued a writ which amounted to an unequivocal demand for possession, I think the same thing would be true, but here they have not done either of those things. They do not want to recognise the lease, and, therefore, they do not demand that the rent shall be paid to them. The proceedings for possession must be counted as a nullity because it is admitted that they cannot be effective, and I cannot think that the issuing of admittedly ineffective proceedings amounts to an unequivocal demand for possession. It is not unequivocal because on the facts it is bound to fail. Therefore, it does not seem to me that the mortgagees have intervened to an extent which demands that the defendants be given protection against the possibility of having to pay rent twice over. In those circumstances that defence cannot succeed and the trustee is entitled to judgment for the instalments of rent which he asks by his writ, and I propose to give judgment for £625, with costs. A

HARRISON v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

[Leeds Assizes (Jones, J.), April 27, 28, May 9, 1949.]

Mine—Coal mine—Safety—Shot firing—Breach of statutory duty by servant of mine owner—Liability of mine owner—General Regulations, dated July 10, 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), reg. 1, made under Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 50), s. 86 (1)—Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 6), cl. 2 (e) (as amended by S.R. & O., 1937, No. 1049, and S.R. & O., 1938, No. 1409). C

By the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 90 : "If any person who is bound to observe the regulations of any mine, acts in contravention of or fails to comply with any of them, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and also the owner, agent, and manager of such mine shall each be guilty of an offence . . . unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the regulations, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance." Regulation 1 of the General Regulations (dated July 10, 1913) made under s. 86 (1) of the Act provides : "It shall be the duty of the manager and under-manager to carry out and to the best of their ability enforce the provisions of every Order in force under the Act regulating the . . . use . . . of explosives, and it shall be the duty of all persons employed in or about the mine to comply with the provisions of the said Orders." By cl. 2 (e) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (as amended) : "The person firing the shot shall, before doing so, see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter, and he shall also take suitable steps to prevent any person approaching the shot." D E F

The plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants in their coal mine, was injured as a result of a breach of cl. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934 by a shot firer, S., who was also an employee of the defendants. The plaintiff was driving a drift from one seam to another and, it being necessary to loosen some stone, requested S. to fire a shot which he did without warning the plaintiff or ensuring that the plaintiff was in a place of safety. The defendants had taken all reasonable means, by publishing the regulations, to enforce and secure compliance with the regulations. In a claim by the plaintiff for damages for breach of statutory duty by the defendants, their servants or agents. G H

Held : in the circumstances and on the true construction of reg. 1 of the General Regulations, 1913, and of cl. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934, there was no duty imposed on the defendants to carry out the provisions of cl. 2 (e) the failure to comply with cl. 2 (e) was that of S. ; and the plaintiff's claim must fail.

ACTION tried by JONES, J., without a jury.

D The plaintiff claimed damages from his employers, the National Coal Board, for injuries sustained on Jan. 27, 1948, and alleged to be due to negligence, breach of common law duty and breach of statutory duty, under cl. 2 (e) and (h) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, by the defendants, their servants, or agents. The defendants pleaded that the negligence (if any) was the negligence of a shot firer in common employment with the plaintiff and that the E statutory duty was only imposed on the shot-firer and not the defendants. They also alleged contributory negligence by the plaintiff. JONES, J., held that there was no breach of statutory duty by the defendants.

F Cur. adv. vult.

May 9, 1949. JONES, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiff's claim is for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence and breach of statutory duty of the defendants, their servants, or agents, in the management and control of the North Gawber Colliery which is owned, occupied, and worked by the defendants, the National Coal Board. G [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the circumstances in which one, Spence, a shot-firer in the defendants' mine, negligently and in breach of his statutory duty caused injury to the plaintiff, and continued :] The question I have to decide is whether the defendants, as well as Spence, have been guilty of a breach of statutory duty. The defence of common employment is an answer to the plaintiff's claim based on negligence, but it cannot be relied on by the defendants H if they have been guilty of a breach of statutory duty. I find that all precautions had been taken by the manager and under-manager of the mine to ensure that shot-firing should be carried out with care, and that the defendants took all reasonable means, by publishing the regulations, to secure compliance with them. I further find that the only person in default was Spence and that the only fault of which he was guilty was failure to give a warning that he was about to fire the shot and failure to make certain that the plaintiff had come out of the drift to a place of safety before the shot was fired. The question for decision, therefore, is whether the duty to fire the shot carefully was a duty imposed on the defendants, as owners of the mine, as well as on Spence the shot-firer.

Section 61 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, empowers the Secretary of State, by Order to regulate the use of explosives at any mine. In exercise of this power, the Secretary of State made the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 6) which (as amended by S.R. & O., 1937, No. 1049, and S.R. & O., 1938, No. 1409), is still in force. Clause 2 (a) of that Order prescribes how a charge shall be placed in a hole, and provides :

> " . . . It shall be the duty of the person firing the shot to satisfy himself that these requirements are fulfilled before he fires the shot."

There was no breach of that duty in this case. Clause 2 (e) imposes on the shot-firer the duty of seeing that all persons in the vicinity have taken shelter. This is the duty that was not performed by Spence. Clause 6 was referred to by both counsel, but there was no evidence of any breach of the duty imposed by that paragraph which requires that the appointment of persons qualified to be, or allowed to be, shot-firers should be in writing. Spence was a competent person and had been appointed a shot-firer by the manager in writing.

Regulation 1 of the General Regulations of 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), made under s. 86 of the Act of 1911, provides :

> " It shall be the duty of the manager and under-manager to carry out and to the best of their ability enforce the provisions of every Order . . . regulating the . . . use . . . of explosives."

Therefore, it is the duty of the manager and under-manager to carry out and enforce to the best of their ability para. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934. The question is whether this duty is imposed on the owners also. Section 89 of the Act of 1911 makes the General Regulations and any special regulations the regulations for each particular mine. By s. 90 :

> " If any person who is bound to observe the regulations . . . fails to comply with any of them, he shall be guilty of an offence . . . and also the owner, agent, and manager . . . shall each be guilty of an offence . . . unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing the regulations, to prevent such . . . . non-compliance."

Counsel for the plaintiff relied on David v. Britannic Merthyr Coal Co. (1), a decision of a majority of the Court of Appeal that was affirmed by the House of Lords. It appears from the short report of the hearing in the House of Lords that some of their Lordships did not approve of some of the reasons given by the majority of the Court of Appeal for their decision, but they did not say which were the reasons of which they did not approve. It was a decision on regulations and other provisions in the Coal Mines Regulation Acts, 1887 and 1896, which differ from the regulations now in force, but the decision was that the duty thrown on a mine-owner by the general rules as to the use of explosives in a mine contained in the Coal Mines Regulation Acts and the special statutory rules made thereunder was an absolute duty and not merely a duty to take all reasonable means to prevent their contravention. In his judgment FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said ([1909] 2 K.B. 157) : " The sole question to ask is whether or not the statute has imposed the duty on the employer." Later, he says (ibid., 158) :

> " It follows, therefore, that our decision in this case must turn upon our answer to the question, Do the Coal Mines Regulation Acts, including the general and special rules made under them, and which have statutory force, impose on the defendants the duties the non-performance of which led to the death of the workman ? "

BUCKLEY, L.J., appears to have considered that the provisions of s. 50 of the Act of 1887 created in the owner liability in a civil action, and this is important as the provisions of s. 50 are very like the provisions of s. 90 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. Another case relied on by counsel for the plaintiff was Yelland v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (2) where it was held that under reg. 117 of the General Regulations of 1913 it is the duty of the owners of a mine, A not only to enforce, but also to comply with, those regulations. A limited company can only act in certain respects by its agents or servants, and if it delegate the performance of its statutory duty to a servant, a breach of that duty by the servant is in law the company's own breach and it cannot avail itself of the doctrine of common employment as against claims by other servants or their representatives. Moreover, s. 102 (8) of the Act of 1911 is not applicable B in such circumstances, for it is not possible for the company to say that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent a deliberate breach by the servant or agent to whom it has specially delegated the duty. DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 284, 285) :

> "The first question upon which the decision of this appeal depends is whether or not, in the circumstances of the case, and on the true construction C of the statute, there was a breach of statutory duty by the defendants, the mine-owners . . . If it is right to say that the defendants failed to comply with reg. 132 (e), and not merely that one of their workmen failed to comply with it, then the defendants were guilty, subject to any defence they may have under ss. 90 and 102, of a breach of statutory duty . . . It is plain that the Act imposes a duty on the mine-owner himself to comply with some D at least of the regulations as to electricity. Otherwise reg. 117 would limit the duty of the mine-owner to the 'enforcing' of the regulations."

That decision of the Court of Appeal that the duty was imposed on the mine-owner seems to have been based mainly on the fact that reg. 117 contained the words : "It shall be the duty of the mine-owner, agent and manager to comply with and enforce the . . . regulations," though MACKINNON, L.J., does not E seem to have based his decision only on the words of the regulation. DU PARCQ, L.J., however, said (ibid., 285) :

> "The mine-owner's duty, however, is not merely 'to enforce.' It is 'to comply with and enforce'."

Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (3), Wilson v. Merry (4), and Black F v. Fife Coal Co. (5) were also referred to by counsel.

In the present case the material provisions are reg. 1 of the General Regulations, 1913, and cl. 2 (e) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934. No duty is expressly imposed on the mine-owners by any of these regulations as in the case of reg. 117, and that is a point of distinction between this case and Yelland's case (2). Applying the test suggested by DU PARCQ, L.J., in Yelland's G case (2) I hold that in the circumstances of the case and on the true construction of the material regulations there was not a duty on the mine-owners to carry out the provisions of para. 2 (e) of the Order of 1934, and that there was no breach of statutory duty by them.

Arbitration—Award—Interest as from date of award—Power to award—Arbitration Act, 1934 (c. 14), s. 11—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934 (c. 41), s. 3 (1).

Contract—Contract subject to rules of Liverpool Cotton Association—Failure of cotton crop—" Timely fulfilment of contract . . . rendered impossible owing to . . . force majeure "—Contract closed by being invoiced back—Difference payable by sellers—Rules of Liverpool Cotton Association, rr. 48, 53, 227 (8).

By a contract in writing, the sellers sold to the buyer 5,000 bales of cotton equal to type 21 Bilas new crop from Bombay c.i.f. Barcelona. The contract was subject to the rules of the Liverpool Cotton Association, Ltd., r. 48 of which provided : " If owing to any circumstances whatsoever any such contract has not been or is not to be performed it shall not be treated as cancelled but shall be closed by being invoiced back to the seller in accordance with the rules in force at the date of the contract." By r. 227 (8) the invoicing back price was to be based on the exporting value of the cotton on the date appropriate in the appropriate market. Rule 53 provided : " Should the seller be able to produce satisfactory evidence that the timely fulfilment of any contract for the purchase or sale of cotton was rendered impossible owing to unforeseen obstruction to traffic, strike, lock-out, riot, war, quarantine, or force majeure, or should the buyer be unable to take delivery of the cotton owing to such unforeseen contingencies . . . then the arbitrators shall take such facts into consideration in making their award." The Arbitration Act, 1934, s. 11 provides : " A sum directed to be paid by an award shall, unless the award otherwise directs, carry interest as from the date of the award and at the same rate as a judgment debt." By s. 3 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934 : " In any proceedings tried in any court of record for the recovery of any debt or damages, the court may . . . [award] interest . . . on the whole or any part of the debt or damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date when the cause of action arose and the date of the judgment."

Due to a failure of the crop, the sellers were unable to make delivery of the cotton, and, the question of their liability to the buyer having been submitted to arbitration, the arbitrators stated a Case for the opinion of the High Court, asking, inter alia, whether the sellers were relieved from responsibility by virtue of r. 53, and, if not, whether the arbitrators had power to award interest on the difference between the invoicing back price and the contract price until the date of their final order.

HELD : (i) the reference to " timely fulfilment of any contract " in r. 53 dealt with a failure to fulfil a contract within the contract time and not with a case where the subject of the contract had wholly failed, and, therefore, the arbitrators were not bound to take into account the circumstances which prevented the sellers from fulfilling the contract.

(ii) under r. 227 (8) of the rules of the association the price at which the contract should be invoiced back must be based on the exporting value in the market on the appropriate date and not the spot value, and the buyer was entitled to an award of the difference between the price of invoicing back and the contract price, subject to adjustment of c.i.f. and other charges.

(iii) although the Arbitration Act, 1934, s. 11, provided for the payment of interest on the sum awarded from the date of the award, in view of the provisions of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1), an arbitrator can now only give interest in circumstances in which it was recoverable at common law, namely, by agreement or by mercantile custom, and, there being no agreement or custom in the present case, interest could not be awarded.

D SPECIAL CASE stated by arbitrators under the Arbitration Act, 1934, s. 9 (1) (a).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is a Special Case stated by the directors of the Liverpool Cotton Association, Ltd., acting as an appeal tribunal from the decision of an umpire F to whom the dispute between the parties was referred. The Case is in unusual form. The tribunal state that they decided to make an award in alternative form, first, in the form of a Special Case under s. 9 (1) (a) of the Arbitration Act, 1934, and, secondly, in the form of a final and conclusive award which, they say, is to be effective unless either party gives notice within a certain time, as the sellers have done, that they desire to take the opinion of the court on the G question of law raised, and in that event they say that they make their award in the form of a Special Case. It is clear, however, that, as stated, the Case is one of a consultative nature and not an award in the form of a Special Case. The arbitrators ask certain questions of the court, and on the answers given they will have to make an award in accordance therewith. They have not made any alternative award as is usual where the award is put in the form of a Special H Case. The court treats the matter entirely as a consultative case under s. 9 (1) (a).

By a contract in writing dated Jan. 17, 1948, the sellers sold to the buyer 5,000 bales of cotton equal to type 21 Bilas new crop at 18.25*d.* per lb. net c.i.f. Barcelona shipment February/March, 1948, subject to steamer and freight available. The price was inclusive of export duty at the rate of 20 rupees per bale, any difference at the time of shipment to be for the account of the buyer. The contract was subject to the rules and regulations of the Liverpool Cotton Association. The case sets out Orders of the Government of India made in November, 1947, and on Jan. 19, 1948, under which the export of certain Indian cottons was prohibited. It does not appear to be material to consider those Orders for the purpose of deciding whether there was a breach of contract or not, because the appeal tribunal has found that there was, in fact, no cotton to be had in India equal to type 21 Bilas of the new season's crop. Consequently, there was a failure to deliver and arbitration was claimed.

The first point taken by counsel for the sellers was that, as no cotton answering the contract description was grown, the case fell exactly within the decision of Howell v. Coupland (1). In that case the defendant agreed to sell 200 tons of potatoes grown on his land. The crop failed owing to blight so he could only deliver 80 tons. The plaintiff having brought an action for the non-delivery of the other 120 tons, it was held that the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (2) applied, and, as performance was impossible from the perishing of the goods agreed to be sold without his default, the defendant was excused from performance. While there is no finding on this point in the present case we will assume that, had there been an action brought at common law for failure to deliver, the sellers would have had a defence, but, as the contract was subject to the rules of the Liverpool Cotton Association, we have to look at those rules to see what consequences arise from a failure either to deliver or take delivery. Rule 48 is the material rule, and it provides :

> " If owing to any circumstances whatsoever, any such contract has not been or is not to be performed it shall not be treated as cancelled but shall be closed by being invoiced back to the seller in accordance with the rules in force at the date of the contract."

There have been several cases before the courts with regard to a rule of produce associations in this or a similar form, and in spite of the remarkable results which sometimes follow from its application (see for instance Adair & Co., Ltd. v. Birnbaum (3)), there is no doubt, according to the existing authorities, that both arbitrators and the courts must give effect to it. The sellers having made default, it then became the duty of the appeal tribunal to invoice back the cotton to them in accordance with the rules.

Rule 53 provides :

> " Should the seller be able to produce satisfactory evidence that the timely fulfilment of any contract for the purchase or sale of cotton was rendered impossible owing to unforeseen obstruction to traffic, strike, lock-out, riot, war, quarantine, or force majeure, or should the buyer be unable to take delivery of the cotton owing to such unforeseen contingencies, and should the buyer and seller be unable to come to a mutual agreement, then the arbitrators shall take such facts into consideration in making their award."

Counsel for the sellers contended that the tribunal was bound to take into account the fact that the crop had failed, as he put it, from natural causes, and that that would amount to force majeure which, he submitted, meant any circumstance beyond the control of the sellers. The expression "force majeure" is not a term of art in English law though the effect of those words in a contract has often had to be considered. In our opinion, however, r. 53 has no application to the facts of this case even on the assumption that the doctrine of Howell v. Coupland (1) would apply. The rule refers to " the timely fulfilment of any contract " and the word " timely " indicates clearly that the rule is dealing with a failure to fulfil a contract within the contract time. This is reinforced by the specific matters mentioned in the rule, obstruction to traffic, strike, lock-out, riot, war and quarantine. All those matters may delay the fulfilment of a contract. Obstruction to traffic or a strike may prevent the shipment or the delivery in due time, and, in our opinion, the expression "force majeure" must also be construed with regard to the words which precede or succeed it and must, we think, be limited, at any rate, to something preventing in time the fulfilment of the contract : see on this point Lebeaupin v. Richard Crispin & Co. (4). It, therefore, follows that, in making their award, the arbitrators were not bound to take into account the circumstances which prevented the sellers from obtaining cotton to fulfil the contract.

The next question is whether the amount of the difference which the sellers A have to pay to the buyer has been properly calculated. It is not altogether clear to the court on what principle the appeal tribunal has acted, but they seem to have fixed the price at which the cotton is to be invoiced back at the spot price prevailing in Bombay on Mar. 31, 1948, and to have deducted therefrom the spot price ruling on Jan. 17, in each case making an allowance for c.i.f. charges and an additional duty of 92 points. The appeal tribunal must invoice B back the cotton according to the rules, and r. 227 (8) provides that :

> " In cases where a contract made subsequent to June 12, 1947, is to be closed by invoicing back, the invoicing back price for such purpose shall be based upon the ascertained exporting value of the cotton contracted for on the appropriate date in the market appropriate to the country of origin of such cotton, translated to the value at the port of destination and subject C to any variation that may have taken place in the costs of freight and insurance and in the rates of exchange, import and export duty."

In order to fulfil this rule it is necessary that the cotton should be invoiced back at the export value and not at the spot value. The difficulty which, no doubt, arises in the present case is that, as at the date of the breach there was no exportable cotton, it may be said that there is no exporting value which can D be ascertained, but the same is also true of spot value, for, if this crop entirely failed, there can be no spot cotton of this particular staple. We would also point out that it does not appear to us that exporting value is by any means necessarily the same as spot value. Indeed, in many cases it is unlikely to be so. A merchant who knows that he has got to export cotton at a particular date would be unlikely to wait until the last minute and then buy cotton on the E spot. It seems more probable that he would make his purchase in advance at the cheapest price at which he could get it, and that price together with his profit would be export value. No doubt, the spot price of cotton would include some element of profit and one could well visualise a case in which an exporter had made a forward contract to sell at 18.25*d.* per lb. and had been able to buy it, say, at 15*d.* per lb. while the spot price of cotton at the time when he had F to ship it might be 17*d.* per lb. The difficulties of ascertaining the exporting value in the circumstances of this case are obvious, but, as this has to be done in every case where the contract has not been performed owing to any circumstances whatsoever, we think that the tribunal must arrive at the value on such material as is available to them. It may be they can do it by ascertaining the value of comparable cotton in previous years, making allowance for the G upward or downward trend of the market. It may be that they can obtain figures showing the exporting value of other cotton of this staple, but of a different description, and that they will know what allowance should be made for the difference in description. At any rate, they must ascertain the value in the best manner that is open to them, but it must be emphasised that it is the exporting value and not the spot value which has to be ascertained. The H tribunal have evidently been able to ascertain a spot value which, in the absence of actual cotton, would seem to be a notional value, and, therefore, it would seem possible for them to ascertain in the same way an exporting value, which is what the rule requires. It then appears that the tribunal considered the spot value of the cotton at the time of the contract, but that is not the value they must take for the purpose of calculating the difference. They must take the contract price. They are in effect awarding damages, and the damages are the difference between the contract price and the exportable value at the time of the breach, and it is the contract price, therefore, which is material. Having ascertained, in the way we have indicated, the exporting value for the purpose of invoicing back, they must award the difference between the price at which they invoice back and the contract price. Of course, in ascertaining the price at which the cotton is to be invoiced back, they must add the c.i.f. charges, duty and so forth and to the contract price will also be added the 92 points which would have been added in any case to the sellers' invoice if one had been sent.

The other point which falls for decision is whether the appeal tribunal are entitled to award interest on the amount of the difference which they find to be due from the sellers to the buyer. This raises a point of general importance in relation to arbitrations, which, curiously enough, has never fallen for decision since the passing of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. The Case tells us that any sum payable under the rules in respect of a contract which falls to be closed by being invoiced back carries interest under the usual practice of the association from the date of such invoicing back to the date of final award, but there is no provision in the rules for the award of interest, and, as the parties to this contract are not found to be members of the association, and were, in fact, not members, they cannot be bound by any practice of the association, but only by the rules. The question, therefore, is whether arbitrators have any power by common law or by statute to award interest. There is no doubt that prima facie the duty of an arbitrator is to act in accordance with the law of the land. Parties can, no doubt, agree to accept the decision of an arbitrator on a question of law or agree that he may do what he thinks fair in any particular case, and, if an arbitrator makes an award which is not bad on its face and no application has been made to him for a Special Case, or he does not seek the guidance of the court or put his award in the form of a Special Case, the court will not review his finding although he may have proceeded on a wrong principle of law, but if he seeks the guidance of the court either by a consultative Case or by awarding in the form of a Special Case the court must see that the rules of law are applied.

Before the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, it is clear that a court could only award interest if there was an agreement to that effect, express or implied, as, for instance, if it were adjudicating on a contract which in terms provided for the payment of interest, or if by mercantile practice the particular transaction on which it was adjudicating was one which carried interest. A common instance is afforded by bills of exchange which always carried interest, apart, we believe, from the express provision now contained in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. As Lord Mansfield put it (1 Doug. K.B. 376) in Eddowes v. Hopkins (5):

> " . . . though by the common law, book debts do not of course carry interest, it may be payable in consequence of the usage of particular branches of trade ; or of a special agreement . . ."

That case was cited in London, Chatham and Dover Ry. Co. v. South Eastern Ry. Co. (6). The power to give interest, therefore, at law was very limited until the Civil Procedure Act, 1833. Under s. 28 of that Act interest could be awarded if a debt or sum certain was payable by virtue of a written instrument at a certain time. Interest by way of damages was also allowed on all other debts or sums certain if a written demand for payment was made on the debtor giving him notice that interest would be claimed from the date of demand until payment, but interest on damages was only allowed by the statute in a very limited class of actions which we need not set out in detail for they do not include breach of contract. There are to be found in the books certain cases both at law and equity in which in regard to special cases interest was allowed by way of damages, but it is by no means clear whether those cases can now be reconciled with London, Chatham and Dover Ry. Co. v. South Eastern Ry. Co. (6) in which it was held that interest was only payable in three cases, by statute, by agreement, or by mercantile custom. Before the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, there is no case which holds that arbitrators are in any different position from the courts so far as awarding interest is concerned. Re Badger (7) is no exception when it is properly understood. In that case it was held that an arbitrator was not bound by the practice of the Court of Chancery in the method in which he took certain accounts which had A been referred to him. In taking accounts in equity interest was not allowed on either side. The arbitrator in Badger's case (7) did allow interest on both sides of the account and the court refused to set aside his award because they said he was not bound by a rule of practice but could take the accounts in what he considered to be the fair and proper way. The case which would seem to be directly in point is Edwards v. Great Western Ry. Co. (8). In that case the court B approved of the allowance of interest by an arbitrator because it was allowable in the circumstances of that case by the provisions of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833. Accordingly, we think we must take it to be the law that before the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, an arbitrator had the same powers as the court with regard to the award of interest, but no greater power.

The Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, was passed on July C 25, 1934, and the Arbitration Act, 1934, was then already law, having been passed on May 17 of that year. The only reference to interest in the latter Act is in s. 11 which provides that :

> " A sum directed to be paid by an award shall, unless the award otherwise directs, carry interest as from the date of the award and at the same rate as a judgment debt."

D In the Law Reform Act it is provided by s. 3 that :

> " (1) In any proceedings tried in any court of record for the recovery of any debt or damages, the court may, if it thinks fit, [award] interest . . . on the whole or any part of the debt or damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date when the cause of action arose and the date of the judgment."

E

By sub-s. (2) of that section the provisions of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, which deal with interest, namely, ss. 28 and 29, are repealed. So, although in the Arbitration Act, 1934, a provision is made for interest but only on the amount of the award from the date of the award, s. 3 of the Law Reform Act gives no power to an arbitrator to give interest either on debt or damages. F Moreover, as ss. 28 and 29 of the Civil Procedure Act are repealed, we feel driven to hold that not only have arbitrators no power to give interest on damages, but they have been deprived of the powers which they had so long as the sections of the Civil Procedure Act were in force and can now only give it in circumstances in which it was recoverable at common law. It may well be that this was overlooked when the Act was passed, but, if it was a casus omissus or if the power G was taken away per incuriam, it must be put right by the legislature. No doubt, the association could amend their rules and provide that interest could be awarded. Then those persons who have made contracts which are subject to the rules and regulations of the association would be bound by an award which gave interest because as a matter of contract they would have agreed to pay if the award was against them. We feel obliged to hold in this case that there H was no power to award interest as there is no provision in the rules for it.

Case remitted. Parties to pay their own costs.

Re READING'S PETITION OF RIGHT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), April 1, 4, 11, May 19, 1949.]

Master and Servant—Profits obtained by a servant dishonestly by virtue of employment—Right of master to profits—Soldier—Bribes by civilian—Right of Crown thereto. A

A sergeant in the army stationed at Cairo on several occasions, while in uniform, boarded a private lorry and escorted it through Cairo, thus enabling it to pass the civilian police without being inspected. The lorry was loaded with cases, the contents of which were unknown. On each occasion the sergeant received from a civilian a large sum of money of which the military authorities later took possession. B

HELD : the sergeant was entrusted with a uniform to be used solely in the course of his employment for the benefit of the Crown, his master ; a fiduciary relation existed between the Crown and the sergeant regarding the use of the uniform ; the sergeant's use of the uniform was in breach of the duty he owed to the Crown ; he obtained the sums in question by that breach of duty; and, therefore, the Crown was entitled to the money. C

Per curiam : The principles of law applicable to such a case as the present would seem to be the following. When a servant or agent by a breach of duty damnifies his master or principal, the latter can recover in an ordinary action for breach of contract for any loss he has actually suffered, but there is a well established class of cases in which he can so recover whether or not he has suffered any detriment in fact. These are D cases in which the servant or agent has realised a secret profit, commission or bribe in the course of his employment, and the amount recoverable is a sum equal to such profit. In most of these cases it has been assumed that the plaintiff, in order to succeed, must prove that a " fiduciary relation " existed between himself and the defendant and that the defendant acted in breach of this relation, but the term " fiduciary E relation " in this connection is used in a very loose, or, at all events, a very comprehensive sense. If a servant or agent so acts, he is bringing his duty to the plaintiff and his own interest into conflict, in derogation of the fiduciary bond, and cannot be heard to say that duty prevailed and the plaintiff suffered no loss. The plaintiff, whether actually harmed or scatheless, is conclusively presumed not only to have been damnified, F but to have been damnified to an extent measured by the amount of the secret profit received by the defendant. This amount the plaintiff can recover either as money had and received to his use or as an equitable debt.

APPEAL by the suppliant from a decision of DENNING, J., dated May 10, 1948,
A dismissing a petition of right filed by the suppliant for the restitution of money alleged to have been had and received by the Crown to his use, or for the payment to the suppliant of money taken possession of on behalf of the Crown. The suppliant was at all material times in the service of the Crown as a soldier in the regular army. In 1944 he was serving in Cairo as a sergeant in the Royal Army Medical Corps. The Crown contended that the suppliant was a servant
B of the Crown and that the monies in question represented bribes which he had received for accompanying loaded lorries in and about Cairo while wearing His Majesty's uniform, thus enabling the lorries to escape police inspection. DENNING, J., held that the wearing by the suppliant of the uniform of the Crown and his position as a servant of the Crown was the sole cause of his obtaining the money, which he did dishonestly, and, although the Crown had suffered
C no loss, the money belonged to the Crown as his master.

Cur. adv. vult.

D May 17. ASQUITH, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The suppliant, Charles Henry Reading, was, in 1944, serving in Cairo as a sergeant in the Royal Army Medical Corps, where he was in charge of medical stores. In March of that year it was discovered that large sums of money were standing to his credit at banks in Egypt, in his flat were notes to the value of several thousand pounds, and he was possessed of a valuable motor car.
E He was questioned as to these monies and he made a statement which was the foundation of the case for the Crown at the trial before DENNING, J. This trial resulted in the dismissal of his petition of right in which he sought to recover a sum of about £13,000, being the balance of the aforementioned sums which had been seized by the military authorities consequent on his statement. It was conceded that the onus lay on the Crown to establish a right to the retention
F of these monies, or, if the suppliant was entitled to them, a right to set off an equal sum against his claim. This the Crown sought to do on the basis that the suppliant was at all material times a servant of the Crown and that the monies in question represented bribes which he had received for accompanying loaded lorries in and about Cairo while wearing His Majesty's uniform and thus enabling the lorries to escape police inspection. The suppliant gave no evidence
G at the trial, and, accordingly, the facts or inferences of fact had to be deduced from the statement which he had made. The learned judge inferred from this statement that the suppliant had received in all some £20,000 from a man named Manole in the following circumstances. A lorry used to arrive loaded with cases, the contents of which were unknown. The suppliant, in full uniform, boarded the lorry, and escorted it through Cairo, so that it was able to pass
H the civilian police without being inspected. When it reached its destination, it was unloaded, or the contents were transferred to another lorry. Later, the suppliant was handed an envelope containing notes varying in value from £2,000 to £3,000 for each journey. The learned judge stated that it was plain that he received this money because he was a sergeant in the British army and while in uniform was escorting these lorries through Cairo, and that he was clearly violating his duty in so doing. Later in his judgment he said that the use of the facilities provided by the Crown in the shape of the uniform and the use of his position in the Army were the sole reasons why the suppliant was able to get this money. It was solely on that account that he was able to sit in the front of these lorries and give them a safe conduct through Cairo. We agree that the above statement represents the proper inferences of fact to be drawn from the material placed before Denning, J. The only question is as to the law applicable to these facts.

With regard to the law Denning, J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 28): A

> "In my judgment, it is a principle of law that, if a servant takes advantage of his service and violates his duty of honesty and good faith to make a profit for himself, in the sense that the assets of which he has control, the facilities which he enjoys, or the position which he occupies, are the real cause of his obtaining the money as distinct from merely affording the opportunity for getting it, that is to say, if they play the predominant part in his obtaining the money, then he is accountable for it to his master." B

Later, after referring to A.-G. v. Goddard (1), he said (ibid., 29):

> "There was not, in this case, a fiduciary relationship. The suppliant was not acting in the course of his employment. In my opinion, however, those are not essential ingredients of the cause of action. The uniform C of the Crown and the position of the suppliant as a servant of the Crown were the only reasons why he was able to get this money, and that is sufficient to make him liable to hand it over to the Crown."

Counsel for the suppliant contends that this statement of the law goes beyond the authorities and that it appears from the judgment as a whole to be based on the principle of "unjust enrichment" which he contends forms no part D of our law. He argues that Sinclair v. Brougham (2) has established that such a claim as that made by the Crown in the present case must be on the basis of money had and received which requires the imputation of a promise and that the court will not impute such a promise where it involves a participation in the fruits of an illegal transaction.

The principles of law applicable to such a case as the present would seem E to be the following. When a servant or agent by a breach of duty damnifies his master or principal, the latter can, of course, recover in an ordinary action for breach of contract for any loss he has actually suffered, but there is a well established class of cases in which he can so recover whether or not he has suffered any detriment in fact. These are cases in which the servant or agent has realised a secret profit, commission or bribe in the course of his employment, F and the amount recoverable is a sum equal to such profit. In most of these cases it has been assumed that the plaintiff, in order to succeed, must prove that a "fiduciary relation" existed between himself and the defendant and that the defendant acted in breach of this relation, but the term "fiduciary relation" in this connection is used in a very loose, or, at all events, a very comprehensive, sense. A consideration of the authorities suggests that for the present purpose G a "fiduciary relation" exists (a) whenever the plaintiff entrusts to the defendant property tangible or intangible (as, for instance, confidential information) and relies on the defendant to deal with such property for the benefit of the plaintiff or for purposes authorised by him and not otherwise: for instance, Shallcross v. Oldham (3) and A.-G. v. Goddard (1); and (b) whenever the plaintiff entrusts to the defendant a job to be performed, for instance, the H negotiation of a contract on his behalf or for his benefit, and relies on the defendant to procure for the plaintiff the best terms available: for instance, Lister & Co. v. Stubbs (4) and Powell & Thomas v. Jones & Co. (5). In such cases the defendant may accept a secret profit from a third person in consideration, for instance, of hiring out the plaintiff's chattel or giving away the plaintiff's secret or awarding the plaintiff's contract to such a third person, or, indeed, may make such a profit by himself masquerading as a third person and selling to, or buying from, the plaintiff in that guise. If he does so, he is bringing his duty to the plaintiff and his own interest into conflict in derogation of the fiduciary bond, and cannot be heard to say that duty prevailed and the plaintiff suffered no loss. The plaintiff, whether actually harmed or scatheless, is conclusively presumed not only to have been damnified, but to have been damnified to an extent measured by the amount of the secret profit received by the defendant : see per JAMES, L.J., in Parker v. McKenna (6) (10 Ch. App. 124). This amount the plaintiff can recover, either as money had and received to his use, or as an equitable debt : see per BOWEN, L.J., in Boston Deep Sea Fishing and Ice Co. v. Ansell (7) (39 Ch.D. 367). It is not very clear why ROWLATT, J., in A.-G. v. Goddard (1) held that the sum claimed could be recovered in equity only, and not as money had and received at common law, for he cites the passage from BOWEN, L.J., in the Boston case (7).

As regards money had and received, it was argued for the suppliant that the law cannot impute to the defendant a fictitious promise which, if actually made, would have been void. No doubt, an actual promise in advance of the event by A to B to pay over any bribe A might receive as the result of breaking the local criminal law would have been void for illegality, but an actual promise made by A, after he has, without B's knowledge or privity, received such a bribe, to pay it over to B, would not be void on this ground, and it is to that point of time, in our view, that the law refers the imputed promise. Sinclair v. Brougham (2) relied on under this head is not in point. It deals with lack of capacity to contract, not with illegality of consideration, and it decides nothing as to the point of time at or from which the imputed promise must be considered as operating. In the present case the master, the Crown, entrusts to its servant a uniform, to be used for the master's interest and benefit, and not otherwise. It is not the soldier's property. He may not sell it, but it is, in our view, in the course of his employment to wear it. That is one of the class of acts which qua soldier he is employed to do. He must wear it at the time and place and in the manner and/or for the purpose which the master prescribes, or, in the absence of specific directions, for the benefit and in the interests of his master and not otherwise. The master's interest in the circumstances of this case included the maintenance and promotion of harmonious relations with the Egyptian government, with which the Crown was allied against Germany and Italy, an interest which would hardly be advanced if the soldier systematically abetted violations of the Egyptian criminal code. A uniform is in one aspect a physical object, but it is also the vehicle of certain intangible adjuncts—authority, prestige, immunities of various kinds, a certain status and standing. Inter alia it carries with it facilities for imparting a veneer of officialism and legality to transactions which, without its imprimatur, would arouse suspicion. These facilities attached to the uniform the suppliant was bound to use for his master's benefit. It seems not only a natural but also an almost inevitable inference from the facts of this case that it was precisely these facilities which the suppliant sold and Manole bought. He had no more right to do this than to sell the uniform itself. The suppliant consciously used his uniform to disarm the suspicions of the Egyptian police—to divert their suspicion from what he must have known to be an illegal enterprise in the traffic of drugs or drink, and he made a fortune by doing so. This use of the uniform was not only in breach of Egyptian criminal law, but flagrantly in breach of the duty the suppliant owed to the Crown. Assuming a fiduciary relation is necessary to enable the Crown to recover, we are of opinion, differing in this respect from the learned trial judge, that in the wide sense in which the term is used in the relevant cases such a relation subsisted in this case as to the user of the uniform and the opportunities and facilities attached to it, and that the suppliant obtained the sums claimed by acting in breach of the duties imposed by that relation. The inference of a fiduciary relation is certainly not weakened by the circumstance that the suppliant was a non-commissioned officer on active service in a foreign country allied with His Majesty, but we do not wish to be taken as holding that, if the fiduciary relation were absent, the appeal would necessarily succeed. We are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[King's Bench Division (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver, Birkett, Lynskey and Sellers, JJ.), May 9, 17, 1949.]

Medicine—Medical practitioner—Falsely pretending to be a registered person—Use of title "doctor of medicine"—Doctor of medicine of Berlin University—Need to prove wilful falsity—"M.D., BLN."—Medical Act, 1858 (c. 90), s. 40.

By the Medical Act, 1858, s. 40: "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner or apothecary, or any name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician, or surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding £20." Persons entitled to be registered are set out in sched. (A) to the Act.

The respondent, a qualified doctor of medicine of Berlin University, carried on in England the practice of consultant on eye troubles, but he was not registered, and was not entitled to be registered, under the Act of 1858, nor had he applied for registration under the Medical Practitioners and Pharmacists Act, 1947. On his notepaper and on a professional plate fixed to the door of his premises, the letters "M.D., BLN." appeared after his name. Until 1944 he had described himself as "M.D., Berlin," but after certain unpleasant incidents he had abbreviated "Berlin" to "BLN." to conceal the fact that his degree was obtained in Germany. On his being charged with offences against s. 40 of the Act of 1858 in that he had wilfully and falsely used the title of doctor of medicine and the description "M.D.", thereby implying that he was registered under the Act, the justices dismissed the informations on the grounds that he had not wilfully and falsely used the title of doctor of medicine and that the use of the letters "M.D., BLN." did not imply that he was registered under the Act of 1858. On appeal to the Divisional Court, Held: a person did not commit an offence under s. 40 if he honestly believed on reasonable grounds that he was within his rights in describing himself as he did; to commit an offence under the section a person must be shown to have acted wilfully and falsely; it was for the justices to decide whether or not he had done so; the justices had found that the respondent had not so acted and had not implied that he was registered under the Act; there was evidence on which they could properly so find; and, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

CASES STATED by Brighton justices.

On June 11, 1948, at a court of summary jurisdiction for the county borough of Brighton, informations were preferred by the appellant, a representative of the Medical Defence Union, charging the respondent with wilfully and falsely using the title of doctor of medicine, contrary to the Medical Act, 1858, s. 40, and wilfully and falsely using the description "M.D.", thereby implying that he was registered under the Act, contrary to s. 40 thereof. The justices dismissed the informations on the grounds that the respondent had not wilfully and falsely used the title of doctor of medicine and that the letters "M.D., BLN." did not imply that he was registered under the Medical Act, 1858. The appeal, which was heard before a full court, was now dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Havers, K.C., and Harold Brown for the appellant.
D. E. Evans for the respondent.

Cur adv. vult.

May 17. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The respondent was charged before a court of summary jurisdiction for the county borough of Brighton, first, for that he on Apr. 1, 1948, did wilfully and falsely use the title of doctor of medicine, contrary to the Medical Act, 1858, s. 40, and, secondly, that on the same day he did wilfully and falsely use the description "M.D.", thereby implying that he was registered under the Medical Act, 1858, contrary to s. 40 of the said Act. There were also two similar summonses alleging the same offences on May 25, 1948. The two offences charged on each day are, in fact, alternative and in respect of each day to which they relate the respondent, if convicted, would only be liable to one penalty. The informations were dismissed.

On Apr. 2, the appellant, a representative of the Medical Defence Union, received from the respondent a reply to a letter which the appellant had written requesting an appointment. The letter from the respondent bore on the left-hand corner the words "William Luftig, M.D., BLN." It was written from 44, Preston Park Avenue, Brighton, where the respondent lives and carries on the practice of consultant on eye troubles. On May 25, there was fixed to the door of these premises a professional plate bearing the words and letters "William Luftig M.D., BLN." The respondent's name appeared in the telephone directory for Brighton with the same letters after his name, but in that directory full stops appear after each of the letters, while on the letter paper and plate there were no stops. The justices find that the stops in the directory were a printer's error and were not on the entry form completed by the respondent. In Kelly's Directory for the district his name is given as "William Luftig M.D. Berlin." The justices found that the respondent used the abbreviation "BLN" on his plate and notepaper since coming to Brighton in 1944 and that he had not used the word "Berlin" because he had received threatening letters and swastikas had been marked on the wall of his house. The respondent had studied medicine in Germany and passed his final examination in June, 1913. In August, 1914, he had been granted by the Minister of the Interior "approval as a physician," and in November, 1914, the Frederick Wilhelm University of Berlin conferred on him "the immunities and privileges, ornaments and honours, of doctor of medicine." The diploma was produced and there is no doubt that the justices considered that it was a diploma granted by a genuine university.

It would be convenient here to say what the true implication is that attaches to the use of the expression "doctor of medicine" or its recognised abbreviation, "M.D." The term "doctor" is now commonly used to mean any medical practitioner, but, when that word is used in conjunction with some particular branch of learning, it means one who in any faculty has attained to the highest degree conferred by a university. We take this from the OXFORD DICTIONARY. Thus, a person who describes himself as a doctor of medicine represents that he has had this degree conferred on him by a university as the result of competent examination. That there are bogus concerns masquerading as universities who sell bogus degrees may well be true, and, if the only title of a person who describes himself as a doctor of medicine is a piece of parchment and a hood which he has bought and paid for from some commercial concern, the courts will know how to deal with such an imposture.

It was further found by the justices that in January, 1940, the secretary of the Medical Defence Union had written to the respondent drawing his attention to the London Telephone Directory in which he was described as "Luftig, William, M.D. Berlin, Physn." The letter informed the respondent that the use by him of the title "physician" was a direct infringement of the Medical Act, 1858, and rendered him liable to penalties. The letter went on to say:

> ". . . Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) had decided that it was illegal for any person to make use of the word 'physician' associated with any qualifications of any kind unless he be an individual whose name appears on the Medical Register."

Whether that is an altogether accurate description of the decision in Whitwell v. Shakesby (1) is one of the matters which we shall have to consider in the present case, but, having received that letter, the respondent answered it saying that he would take the necessary steps to see that the offending word "physician" or its abbreviation did not appear again in the directory, and it appears that thereafter he did not describe himself as a physician. The respondent is not registered under the Medical Act, 1858. The justices dismissed the informations and have stated their opinion in these terms :

> " We, being of the opinion that the respondent had not wilfully and falsely used the title of doctor of medicine, held that the informations alleging that offence should be dismissed, and, as the respondent had used the description " M.D., BLN." and not " M.D." simply as stated in the summons, we held that the letters " M.D., BLN." did not imply that he was registered under the Medical Act, 1858."

On an application being made to the justices to state a Case they refused to state one, but this court directed them to do so. They, apparently, considered that the application was frivolous and that their decision raised a question of fact alone. The justices may be surprised to know that on the Case coming before the court it appeared to present features of such difficulty and importance that it was ordered to be re-argued before a full court. While not imputing any contumacy to the Bench, their refusal to state a Case when requested to do so is to be regretted, as it has involved the parties in considerable extra expense.

Before considering the law applicable to the case, we think it well to emphasise that a Divisional Court of five judges has no greater powers than one of three or even two. This court is bound by its own decision as is the Court of Appeal, whatever the number of judges that may constitute it : see Huddersfield Police Authority v. Watson (2). The principles of Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (3), apply equally to this court. It was there held by the Court of Appeal ([1944] 2 All E.R. 300) :

> " The only exceptions to this rule . . . are . . . (i) The court is entitled and bound to decide which of two conflicting decisions of its own it will follow. (ii) The court is bound to refuse to follow a decision of its own which, though not expressly overruled, cannot in its opinion stand with a decision of the House of Lords. (iii) The court is not bound to follow a decision of its own if it is satisfied that the decision was given per incuriam."

That is to say, the court is not bound by a decision of its own if a case or a statute had not been brought to the attention of the court and the decision had been given in ignorance or forgetfulness of the existence of that case or statute. The case most relied on by the appellant here was Jutson v. Barrow (4), and it was because the court before which the case which is now before us came in the first instance thought that there were certain dicta in Jutson v. Barrow (4) which might be in conflict with or go beyond certain earlier decisions, which were apparently not cited, that they directed a re-argument, and when re-argument is directed it is often desirable that it should take place before a full court.

We now turn to a consideration of the relevant statutes. The Medical Act, 1858, is entitled " An Act to regulate the qualifications of practitioners in medicine and surgery " and the preamble states that :

> " . . . it is expedient that persons requiring medical aid should be enabled to distinguish qualified from unqualified practitioners."

The Act then sets up a general council [s. 3] and provides for the registration of medical practitioners [s. 15]. Schedule (A) sets out the persons who are entitled to be registered and under para. 11 of sched. (A) a doctor of medicine of a foreign university could only claim to be registered if he had been practising in the United Kingdom before Oct. 1, 1858. By s. 34 it is provided that the words :

> " ' Legally qualified medical practitioner ' or ' duly qualified medical practitioner ' or any words importing a person recognised by law as a medical practitioner or member of the medical profession, when used in any Act of Parliament, shall be construed to mean a person registered under this Act."

Section 40, which is the material section in this case, provides :

> "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title of a physician, doctor of medicine, licentiate in medicine and surgery, bachelor of medicine, surgeon, general practitioner or apothecary, or any name, title, addition, or description implying that he is registered under this Act, or that he is recognised by law as a physician, or surgeon, or licentiate in medicine and surgery, or a practitioner in medicine, or an apothecary, shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding £20."

The qualifications for registration were extended by the Medical Act, 1886, s. 12, which entitled a person to be registered if he held a recognised foreign diploma granted in a foreign country to which the Act might be applied by Order in Council [s. 17], but no question arises under this Act as it was never applied to Germany. Provision has been made by the Medical Practitioners and Pharmacists Act, 1947, enabling the council to register certain foreign medical practitioners if they see fit and subject to certain conditions which it is unnecessary to set out as no application for registration under this Act had been made by the respondent.

Now, the Medical Acts do not prohibit any person from practising medicine or surgery. The Act of 1858 confers certain privileges on registered persons, e.g., that none but a registered person can recover his fees in a court of law [s. 32] or sign a certificate required to be signed by a medical practitioner [s. 37]. Unregistered persons are prohibited from holding appointments at hospitals, infirmaries or dispensaries which are not supported wholly by voluntary contributions [s. 36], from which it is clear that an unregistered medical man may hold an appointment in a voluntary hospital. What is prohibited by s. 40 of the Act is the use of certain titles, such as physician, doctor of medicine and so forth, which of themselves imply, or are to be taken to imply, that the person using it is registered, or the use of any name, title, addition or description which would give rise to a similar implication. It is the opening words of this section that have given rise to much of the difficulty which surrounds the question. They are : "Any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be or take or use the name or title . . ." and it is certainly significant, as counsel for the respondent pointed out, that Acts dealing with other professions, such as solicitors, veterinary surgeons and dentists, do not contain the words "wilfully and falsely." Counsel for the appellant contended, first, that the title "doctor of medicine" could only be used by a person who was registered. If that be so, it would follow that it would be an offence for the Regius Professor of Medicine at one of our great universities who might not have taken steps to get himself registered, having the intention of leading an academic life and not of practising, to describe himself as a doctor of medicine. If he wrote a treatise, he could not so describe himself, nor could a professor of international reputation who came to this country and read a paper before various learned medical societies and afterwards published it describe himself as an "M.D.", though that degree had been conferred on him by the University of Paris, Vienna, Harvard or any other of the great teaching institutions of the world. An alternative submission by counsel for the appellant was that the Act at least prevented a man from using the title unless he was qualified to be registered, but we can find no words in the statute which would support that contention. A man can only be registered if he possesses certain qualifications, but, if he uses a title which would imply that he is registered, it appears to us that he would commit an offence if, in fact, he is not registered, however qualified he might be.

The first question that we have to decide is whether a person on whom the degree of doctor of medicine has been conferred by a genuine, and not a bogus, university is entitled to describe himself as a doctor of medicine with or without some qualification which would indicate the origin of his doctorate and would not imply that it was one which would qualify him for registration in this country, or whether, not being registered in this country, he is absolutely prohibited from so styling himself. In Jutson v. Barrow (4), the authority most relied on by the appellant, LORD HEWART, C.J., said ([1936] 1 K.B. 243) :

A
> " . . . the effect of this section is to prohibit the use of any of these named and well-known descriptions except in cases where they are lawfully employed . . . If one of those well-known professional descriptions is employed, I think a defendant cannot be heard to say . . . that the name which he employed did not imply that he was registered or recognised in the sense described by the statute."

B By " recognised," His Lordship, apparently, meant " qualified." HUMPHREYS, J., in the same case said (ibid., 248) :

> " It appears to me that the prohibition against the use of the named words and titles or of any other titles having the same implication is absolute."

C These are two of the passages which led the court, when the case was first opened, to think that a close examination of the authorities was necessary. Neither of the judgments to which reference has just been made deal with the words " wilfully and falsely," though SINGLETON, J., did refer to those words in his judgment. The one matter which distinguishes Jutson v. Barrow (4) from this case is that the practitioner in that case was not only unregistered, but had no D medical qualification or degree at all. We have had the advantage, through the industry of counsel for the respondent, of being referred to several cases which were not apparently cited, or, at any rate, considered, by the court in Jutson's case (4), and it is necessary for the court to review them all for the purpose of deciding the present case.

We now turn to the authorities and it would be convenient to take them in E chronological order. The first is Ladd v. Gould (5). In that case the defendant called himself a " surgeon and mechanical dentist," and the court held that it was for the justices to decide, as a question of fact and not of law, whether the use of the word " surgeon " coupled with the words " mechanical dentist," or such like titles, was an offence against the statute. The justices dismissed the information and COCKBURN, C.J., said that he should have come to the F same conclusion, but the important thing from the point of view of this case is that the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said (1 L.T. 326) :

> " I do not think there was any falsehood, or any intention to deceive, which was necessary in order to bring the case within the Act. That was also the opinion of the magistrates, though they might have come to a different opinion."

G

Ladd v. Gould (5), it will be observed, was heard within two years of the passing of the Act, and the court held that it was necessary that there should be falsehood or the intention to deceive.

Ellis v. Kelly (6) was heard later in the same year in the Court of Exchequer. The remarkable feature of that case is that it is reported in several reports, H but the reports of the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., differ very materially. A perusal of those reports, however, enables the court to see the ratio decidendi, and it is that which is binding and not the expressions used. In that case the respondent was a member of the Royal College of Surgeons and a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries. He was possessed of a German medical diploma, and called himself " Dr. Kelly " and it was said that that was tantamount to using the title of doctor of medicine and, therefore, was an offence under the Act, as he was not registered as such. It is difficult to believe that in these days when, as we have already said, the term "doctor" is commonly used to denote a medical practitioner without regard to his particular qualifications, there would be a prosecution in such circumstances, but the importance of the case is that it is clear that the reason why the court held that there was no offence was that, as the respondent believed that he was entitled to use the title of doctor, the justices were justified in finding that he had not done so wilfully and falsely. That is clear from the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., whichever report is looked at, and WILDE, B., said that the only question was the meaning of the words "wilfully and falsely." He said (6 H. & N. 227) :

> "The defendant had a German diploma, which he might reasonably believe entitled him to describe himself as he did . . . it was a question of fact for the magistrates whether [he] used the particular description, knowing he was not entitled to it and with intent to deceive the public."

Then comes Andrews v. Styrap (7). There a druggist added the letters "M.D." after his name in the bills that he sent in for professional attention and medicine. He was purporting to practise medicine and he claimed to describe himself as an M.D. on the ground that he had a diploma from an American university. He had never been in America nor undertaken any examination in order to obtain the diploma. The court upheld the conviction and obviously did so on the ground that this was a bogus degree. MARTIN, B., said (26 L.T. 707) that there was ample evidence that the appellant acted "wilfully (for he did it on purpose) and falsely (because he pretended thereby to be on an equal footing with any regularly bred and registered physician or M.D. in England)" and he must have known that his diploma was in fact "utterly worthless and valueless as an indication of the possessor's merit." In Carpenter v. Hamilton (8), the defendant kept a shop where he habitually dispensed medicine and gave advice. He exhibited in his window a diploma in which he was described as a doctor of medicine of the Metropolitan Medical College of New York in the United States of North America. Of the validity of the diploma, beyond production, he gave no further proof. The magistrate dismissed the information, holding that the respondent did not wilfully and falsely pretend to use the name of doctor of medicine contrary to s. 40, as he only represented himself to be, and used the name of, doctor of medicine of this New York college. The court upheld the dismissal, CLEASBY, B., saying (37 L.T. 158) :

> ". . . how is it possible to make out a charge of falsely pretending to be something, when the only evidence is that the man pretends to be what he really is ?"

To reconcile these two cases, we think that in the latter the magistrate must have considered that the college was a genuine, and not a bogus, concern. In Davies v. Makuna (9), s. 40 had to be considered in connection with an action between the defendant, a duly qualified medical practitioner, who had agreed with the plaintiff, who was not duly qualified, to serve the plaintiff as an assistant. PEARSON, J., in the course of his judgment, said (29 Ch.D. 601) :

> "No doubt it is difficult to understand the exact limit of s. 40, and I do not mean to say that I am absolutely certain what is the proper construction of it. But, looking at the preamble of the Act and at s. 32, I think the meaning is, that in order to incur the penalty a person must wilfully and falsely take or use one of the names or titles therein mentioned in such a manner as is calculated to deceive the public."

When that case went to the Court of Appeal, COTTON, L.J., appears to have agreed with that construction.

In 1891 came R. v. Baker, etc., JJ., and Clarke (10), which raised the question whether a medical practitioner, qualified and registered as licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries, London, was entitled to describe himself as a physician or M.D. He contended that he possessed a diploma from some institution in Indianapolis, U.S.A., and so the court said that he was an L.S.A. with an American degree. The court held that he was properly convicted, holding that the letters M.D. would imply that he was registered under the Act, and considered that he had used those letters wilfully and falsely. In 1894 Steel v. Ormsby (11) was again a prosecution for unlawfully assuming the title of M.D. The defendant was a miner who had visited sick persons and supplied them with medicine. He signed death and other certificates, adding the letters " M.D. " and " B.C." after his name, and claimed to be entitled to do it by reason of a certificate granted by a joint stock company called the General Council of Safe Medicine, Ltd., which purported to train and educate its members in medical botany and organic magnetism. The justices found that the defendant had wilfully and falsely taken the title of " M.D.", thereby implying that he was registered. WRIGHT, J., in giving judgment, said (10 T.L.R. 484) that the section " required a statement to be made by the defendant false in fact and known by him to be so," and held that there was evidence that the man had falsely described himself as M.D. COLLINS, J., concurred and said that some doubt raised by expressions of BRAMWELL, B., in Ellis v. Kelly (6) had been removed by later cases. It was a question of fact. The defendant having signed certificates which could only lawfully be given by medical practitioners and describing himself as M.D. and having no diploma or degree but only some certificate given by a bogus institution, there was evidence on which the justices could find as they did.

The next case, in 1896, is R. v. Lewis (Stipendiary Magistrate) & Frickhart, R. v. Same & Bridgwater (12). These were rules calling on the stipendiary magistrate at Cardiff to state Cases. The magistrate had dismissed summonses against each of the defendants for using the letters M.D., and he had refused to state Cases on the ground that the applications were frivolous as he had dismissed the summonses on questions of fact only. Eliza Frickhart was an M.D. of Zurich University. Her name had been on the Medical Register, but had been removed therefrom for professional misconduct. The informant who was a retired medical man knew that she was not registered when he consulted her, and the magistrate dismissed the information. In Bridgwater's case (12), the defendant described himself as " Dr. Bridgwater, M.D., U.S.A.", and in the consulting room was hung up what purported to be a diploma of some American university. The magistrate dismissed the summons on the ground that there was no proof of a false pretence for the defendant merely held himself out to be what he was, an M.D. of some American university. The court discharged the rules in both cases. In Frickhart's case (10) COLLINS, J., said (60 J.P. 393) that " there was no proof before the magistrate of a false pretence." In Bridgwater's case (10) GRANTHAM, J., said (ibid.) that no case yet had gone so far as to decide that the use of the letters " M.D." with other letters constituted a holding out that the defendant was a registered M.D., and, as the magistrate had negatived any false pretence, there was no ground for granting the rule. COLLINS, J., concurring, said (ibid.) :

> " . . . the learned magistrate has found that the defendant did not in point of fact pretend that he had a registrable degree, and if so, the magistrate would be perfectly right in the conclusion at which he has arrived . . . On the cases as they now stand there is a complete fog. It is impossible to say whether this is a question of law or of fact."

In Hunter v. Clare (13) a licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries of London, duly registered, described himself as a physician and surgeon and was prosecuted for wilfully and falsely pretending to be, and taking and using the name and title of, physician contrary to s. 40 of the Act of 1858. The court quashed the conviction and CHANNELL, J., having said that he thought, though not without doubt, that the word "physician" was used in s. 40 in a technical sense and that in that sense the appellant was not a physician, went on to say ([1899] 1 Q.B. 641):

> "Then, did the appellant 'wilfully and falsely' describe himself as a physician? On that point Ellis v. Kelly (6) is a distinct authority."

He said that the difference between Ellis v. Kelly (6) and Andrews v. Styrap (7) was that, in the former case, there was a foreign qualification, but a genuine one, and, in the latter, only a bogus diploma. He thought that the conviction should be quashed for, although the appellant incorrectly described himself B as a physician, he did not do so "wilfully and falsely" on the grounds explained by the court in Ellis v. Kelly (6). He concluded his judgment by saying (ibid., 642):

> "The justices ask us two questions: the first, 'Whether or not the appellant holding the title of L.S.A. and being registered as such is authorised C to take and use the name and title of physician in the manner the appellant so used it?' we answer in the negative. To the second, 'Whether on the facts stated we were right in finding that the appellant so described himself wilfully and falsely within the meaning of [the Medical Act, 1858] s. 40?' we say that the justices were wrong, and on that ground we quash the conviction."

D

From these cases it will be seen that there is an unbroken line of authority from 1860 to 1899, supported in the later part of that period by judges of the eminence of R. S. WRIGHT, J., HENN COLLINS, J., and CHANNELL, J., that to commit an offence a defendant must have acted wilfully and falsely and that it is for the justices to decide whether he has done so, and, also, that he does not commit an offence if he honestly believes that he was within his rights in des- E cribing himself as he did. He must, of course, have a reasonable ground for his belief. A person who has passed no examination and has received no qualification from a genuine teaching body cannot adopt one of the titles mentioned in s. 40 of the Act of 1858 and be heard to say that he believed he had such skill as would entitle him so to describe himself. We can sum up this part of the case by saying that there must be mens rea and the presence or absence F of that state of mind must be tested on ordinary principles and in the light of common sense. Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea is a cardinal doctrine of the criminal law. No doubt, the legislature can create offences which consist solely in doing an act, whatever the intention or state of mind of the actor may be. Common instances are provided by many of the offences created by the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. It was an offence, for instance, to G be found within a prohibited area. It was no defence for a person found there to say that he did not know, or even that, at the time, he had no means of knowing, that his presence was prohibited. Overriding considerations of safety placed on citizens the duty of finding out whether a place was a prohibited area or not. Of late years the courts have been so accustomed to dealing with a host of offences created by regulations and Orders independent of guilty H intention that it is desirable to emphasise that such cases should be regarded as exceptions to the rule that a person cannot be convicted of a crime unless it is shown not only that he has committed a forbidden act or default but also that a wrongful intention or blameworthy condition of mind can be imputed to him. Whitwell v. Shakesby (1), is not, we think, in any way in conflict with the decisions that we have quoted. The respondent there had described himself as an osteopathic physician and surgeon. He was an honorary member of the Incorporated Association of Osteopaths, Ltd. and the holder of a certificate from that company, but there was no evidence as to what, if any, examination had to be passed in order to obtain the grant of a certificate. The magistrate had refused to convict on the ground that the respondent did not use the title falsely within the meaning of the Act. It seems to us that the decision of the court, who allowed the appeal and found an offence proved, turns on the point that the respondent, knowing that he had no qualification as a physician or surgeon, must be held to have used that description falsely. That case was much relied on by the court in Jutson v. Barrow (4). We are not expressing any doubt as to the correctness of the decision in the latter case because there again the respondent had no medical training, nor was there anything in the case to show that he could have believed that he was entitled to use the word "surgeon," though we are not in agreement with all the dicta used in the judgments.

We have now to apply the law so far as we can gather it from these many cases to the present. The respondent holds a genuine degree of doctor of medicine granted by a foreign university. There is no reason, therefore, why he should not use that title, and the justices were amply justified in finding that he did not use it wilfully and falsely, but he must not use that title so as to imply that he is registered in this country, because, in our opinion, s. 40 of the Act of 1858 contemplates that the use of the words doctor of medicine, physician, surgeon, or other titles specifically mentioned in the first part of the section, carry the necessary implication that the title is one of those mentioned in sched. (A) to the Act. If, therefore, the respondent described himself, as he at one time did, as "M.D., Berlin," we think that it is clear on the authorities that he committed no offence and that he is entitled to use that description. He is describing himself there as what he is and the addition of the word "Berlin" shows that he is not claiming to be possessed of one of the degrees mentioned in sched. (A) to the Act and does not, therefore, represent that he is registered. The real difficulty in this case is that at Brighton he used the abbreviation "BLN" and he did so on his own admission for the purpose, apparently, of concealing the fact, or, at any rate, of diverting attention from the fact, that his degree was obtained in Germany. The cases, however, oblige us to hold that it is for the justices to consider whether in so doing he has acted wilfully and falsely, and we must take it that they have held he did not, and they have further held that "M.D., BLN." does not imply that he was registered. They might have decided the latter point the other way and it is to be hoped that the respondent will not in future use that abbreviation. He may well incur penalties if he does so. For the reasons given we think that on this point we are bound by the findings of the justices and, as we cannot say that there was no evidence on which they could find as they did, it follows that the appeal must be dismissed. In conclusion, we may express our concurrence with what COLLINS, J., said in R. v. Lewis and Bridgwater (12), viz., that the cases are in "a complete fog." We hope that this review may tend, to some extent, towards dissipating it, and we venture to think that the time has come when the position might be clarified by further legislation.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

DONOVAN v. CAMMELL LAIRD & CO. AND OTHERS.

[Liverpool Assizes (Devlin, J.), February 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, April 12, 1949.]

Dock—Dry dock—Ship under repair—Employee of repairers injured—Liability of dockowners and shipowners—"Occupier"—Notional occupier—Several repairers engaged on work on ship at same time—Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931 (S.R. & O., 1931, No. 133), reg. 10.

Costs—Defendants reasonably joined—Plaintiff succeeding against one defendant, but not against others—Costs of successful defendants awarded against plaintiff—Whether unsuccessful defendant should be ordered to pay costs awarded against plaintiff.

The Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931, provide under the heading "Duties": "It shall be the duty of the occupier to comply with Parts I to VIII of these regulations. Provided that, when a ship is being repaired in public dry dock, the person who contracts with the owner of the ship or with his agent to execute the work of repair shall be deemed to be the occupier for the purposes of Parts I to VIII and it shall be his duty to comply with the said Parts, except as follows: . . . (b) Where the control of the ship apart from the work of repair remains with the shipowner, it shall be the duty of the shipowner, master, or officer in charge, to provide the protection specified in reg. 10 in so far as concerns those hatches or openings which are not required to be used for the purposes of the repairs, but if such protection be removed by any person or persons in the employment of the occupier or at his or their request, the occupier shall be responsible for its replacement as soon as practicable."

By reg. 10 (in Part I) it is provided: "All openings in decks and tank tops shall be securely protected. Such protection shall be maintained in position and when necessarily removed in the course of work shall be replaced as soon as practicable."

On Jan. 25, 1947, the plaintiff, an employee of the first defendants, was injured while engaged in repairing a ship which belonged to the Crown, but was managed on behalf of the Crown by the third defendants. At the time of injury, the ship was in a public dry dock owned by the second defendants. The dry dock was also accommodating at the material time another vessel undergoing repairs. On Dec. 31, 1946, the third defendants had been notified that the ship was to be transferred to the French government and the repairs being carried out by the first defendants were being effected on behalf of the French government. Other work was being executed on the ship at the material time by the third defendants, who were bound to arrange for all necessary repairs under their agreement with the Crown. There was also work being carried out on behalf of the third defendants by two firms of sub-contractors, and a further firm was engaged on disarming the ship on behalf of the Admiralty. The court held that the first defendants were liable to the plaintiff for failing to provide a safe working system. As to the liability of the second and third defendants under the regulations of 1931,

Held: (i) the effect of the section headed "Duties" was to impose on a notional occupier the duty of complying with reg. 10 which would otherwise be on the actual occupier, in this case the second defendants, but in the present case there were more than a single repairer, which was a possibility not contemplated by the regulations, and, while the duty was not imposed by the regulations on anyone else, by necessary implication it had been lifted from the shoulders of the second defendants.

(ii) although literally para. (b) of the "Duties" section of the regulations would impose liability on the third defendants, who were for this purpose the shipowners and retained control of the ship, the assumption underlying the paragraph was that wherever there was a main repairer (as opposed to a sub-contractor) he would be "the occupier" referred to in the paragraph, but that assumption broke down in the present case because the first defendants, although main repairers, were not under contract to the third defendants and it was impossible to say that the literal application of para. (b) would achieve the result intended. It could not, therefore, be applied to render the third defendants liable. A Judgment having been given for the plaintiff with costs against the first defendants and for the second and third defendants with costs against the plaintiff, the plaintiff asked that the first defendants should be ordered to pay the costs awarded to the second and third defendants.

HELD: although the plaintiff had acted reasonably in the light of the B authorities in joining the second and third defendants, he had acted on a wrong view of the regulations of 1931 and it would not be a proper exercise of the court's discretion to order the first defendants to bear the costs as suggested.

ACTION for damages (i) against the first defendants for failing to provide a safe working system, and (ii) against all defendants under the Factories Act, G 1937, s. 26 (1) and the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931.

The plaintiff, who was employed by Cammell Laird & Co., the first defendants, sustained injuries while employed by them on repair work on a ship called the Empire Rawlinson, which at the material time was in a graving dock belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, the second defendants. The ship was in the registered ownership of the Crown, but she was managed by the H third defendants, Alfred Holt & Co. The plaintiff suffered his injuries by falling into a hold of the ship converted for use as a tank. The tank tops were on the lower tween decks. There were two decks above, each of which had a hatch, and, unless both hatches were open, the lower tween deck was in darkness. The two tank tops were separate structures near the centre of the deck, being separated by a strip of deck about 5ft. wide. The port one measured 11ft. by 8ft., and the starboard one was slightly larger. Each opening was separately protected by a coaming 6ins. high, on which the tank lids rested. The lids were hinged on the side nearest the fore and aft line of the ship, and were opened upwards and inwards towards the said line. In the strip of deck between the two tank tops there was a girder or channel ladder 13ins. wide rising from the lower tween deck to the deck above, and when the tank lids were raised they were secured to the girder at the top, forming a tunnel or passageway, roughly triangular in shape, between the tank tops. The forward entrance to the tunnel was obstructed by the girder, leaving a space on either side just wide enough for a man to squeeze through. By the bulkhead at the forward end of the tween deck and slightly to the starboard of the fore and aft line of the ship there was another ladder, enclosed in a booby hatch, giving access to the deck above. It was while he was going aft from the base of the booby hatch intending to enter the tunnel that the plaintiff missed his way and fell into the forward port corner of the starboard tank top. At the time of the accident the tween deck was lighted only by a cluster of four bulbs in a box which had been set at the aft port corner of the port opening so that it threw a light on the aft end of the port lid which the plaintiff and two other men were repairing. The hatches of the decks above were closed. Some staging was placed across the port opening for the men to stand on while at work. It appeared that a life line passing through stanchions fixed to the deck had been erected round the opening, but at the time of the occurrence it afforded no protection because it had been slackened, apparently by an employee of the first defendants. The plaintiff had completed his work on the tank lid before lunch on the day in question, and after lunch returned to collect the tools which he and two others had been using. He made two journeys through the tunnel carrying tools which he passed up from the booby hatch to a fellow workman on the deck above, but in returning for the third time for the remaining tools stepped into the tank opening instead of the tunnel, and fell some 25ft.

Devlin, J., held that the first defendants were liable for failure to provide a safe system of work because in removing the protection which the life line would have given they had created a source of danger which need never have existed, and the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. The plaintiff's claims against the second and third defendants depended mainly on the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931, and the facts relevant thereto are set out in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

Apr. 12. DEVLIN, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts and continued. On these facts I am now able to consider the different causes of action which the plaintiff alleges. In the first place, he alleges that his employers, Cammell Laird, the first defendants, failed in their common law duty to provide a safe system of work and a safe place of work. In my judgment, the principal cause of the plaintiff's injuries was the fact that the starboard opening was unprotected. I think that the state of the light played only a minor part. Although the starboard opening was not fully illuminated I judge that there was sufficient light to reveal the boundary of the opening clearly enough to anyone who knew, as the plaintiff did, that it was there. It may be that a better light would have brought it more sharply to his attention, but it was what the plaintiff described in the evidence to which I have referred as his mis-judgment of the position that led to the disaster. That description is, in my view, a euphemism for saying that he had not got his mind fully on what he was doing. The fact remains, however, that, if the starboard opening had been properly guarded, the plaintiff would have been protected from his own inadvertence. Counsel for the first defendants accepts that it is the employer's duty to make a proper lay-out of the job and to take reasonable steps to guard against those dangers incidental to the work reasonably to be contemplated by the employer, but he contends that the starboard

A opening was not such a danger. There was, he says, no reason for the employer to anticipate that the plaintiff would ever go near the forward end of that opening. I think that the plaintiff might very well have done his work without going near it, and I have said that the natural way for him to get to his job was to go round the other side of the port opening. I do not accept the contention that this route would have plunged him into darkness. It would have B meant going behind the cluster, but I judge that the light from the cluster was not so concentrated as to leave complete darkness behind it. I do not think that the employer ought to have anticipated specifically that his workmen would go through the tunnel. Having regard to the fact that it was in darkness and its entrance obstructed by the girder I think that it was an unlikely route for them to choose. The plaintiff and Reid did not strike me as being at all
C intelligent or quick-witted men. In this respect they were not untypical.
Workmen cannot always be relied on to do the most sensible and logical thing.
They are apt for one reason or another, whether sensible or not, to wander a bit about the place they are working in. What a careful employer ought,
I think, to have contemplated was that an unprotected opening so near a place of work was, for these general reasons, a probable source of danger. When a D source of danger is near the border line, neither acutely obvious nor very remote, it is legitimate to inquire whether any elaborate precautions against it would have been needed. It may be, I do not say it is, that to require the starboard lid to be closed—the work of half an hour—would be asking too much, but nothing of that sort need have been done. What weighs with me in this case is that it is not so much a question of leaving a source of danger unguarded against as of E creating a source of danger which need never have existed at all. The first defendants found the tank tops adequately protected by the lifeline. I am satisfied from the evidence, as well as by my own judgment, that it was quite unnecessary for the lifeline ever to have been lowered, either for the purpose of laying the staging or for any other phase of the work. It is no answer to say that the plaintiff would in any event have had to go within it, or that its F presence at the forward end might or might not have deterred him from going through the tunnel. A lifeline of this sort is not designed to keep people out.
It is intended primarily no doubt to guard against people outside stumbling or slipping, but it also serves as a warning. The act of crossing it, by stooping underneath or putting a leg over, reminds a man that he is entering a danger area as effectively as if a warning were then spoken in his ear. Its removal
G by Cammell Laird's men was, I think, just as if they had for no good reason taken down a notice which said: "Watch your step."

I hold, therefore, that a source of danger existed at the material time at the plaintiff's place of work, rendering it unsafe for the ordinary workman. That is a matter for which the first defendants are personally responsible. Could they, by taking reasonable steps, have prevented the creation of the danger H or have guarded against it or removed it? The organisation and lay-out of the job and the duty of taking any necessary precautions with regard to it was delegated to Mr. Swan, an employee of the first defendants. I think it is a fair summary of Mr. Swan's evidence that he left it to each department concerned with the preparation of the job, that is the staging and the lighting, to see that they left it safe, and to Sweeney, the plaintiff's immediate superior, to complain if it was not safe. In this there was no system or method at all.
What was everybody's business became nobody's business. Doubtless it was a very small job, and Swan, I daresay, had many things to do. But he did nothing to discharge the duty that was admittedly his, and no-one exercised any co-ordinating function or final supervision to see that the place was safe to work in. I hold, therefore, that a cause of the plaintiff's injuries was the first defendants' breach of duty. Was it the only cause or was there contributory negligence by the plaintiff ? I have already indicated two matters in respect of which such negligence might be suggested. In the first place, the plaintiff did not go the natural and obvious way to his job, but I do not think that this choice of route was so unreasonable or absurd as to be negligent. In the second place, he had not got his mind fully on what he was doing. Although I regard the state of the light as of little importance compared with the absence of protection, I think that it goes some way towards explaining and condoning the plaintiff's inattention. After careful thought and not without hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's behaviour was due to a momentary lapse from alertness such as might affect the ordinary, prudent workmen of his grade, and that it is not to be accounted as a falling short of the standard of care to be expected from him in the circumstances.

The first defendants are, therefore, liable at common law and irrespective of any liability imposed by statute on themselves or their co-defendants to compensate the plaintiff in full for the injuries he has sustained. He fell on his right side and heel, fracturing his heel bone. He sustained serious injuries which in the early stages, at any rate, caused him considerable pain. He is now 47, and permanently unfit for anything except light work which, so far, he has been unable to obtain. By far the most serious item in his claim for damage is, therefore, his loss of earnings, past and prospective. His average wage at the time of the accident was £6 12*s.* 6*d.* a week, and the loss of this sum from the date of the accident up to Feb. 14, 1949, comprises his claim of £1,050 for special damage. I think there should be some small deduction from this sum, since for the preceding twelve months or so he has done domestic work about the house and has thus been able to save himself, he being now a widower, the sum which, had he been in full employment, I think he would probably have had to have paid for domestic assistance. I have to make some allowance for this in the future, as well as in the past, and also for his prospects of obtaining light work regularly or irregularly. I think that a fair sum to award to him, including his special damages, would be £4,500.

I turn now to consider what liability, if any, in respect of this sum is imposed on the second or third defendants under the Shipbuilding Regulations, 1931. It cannot be disputed that there has been a breach of reg. 10, which provides that "all openings in decks and tank tops shall be securely protected." The question I have had to consider is on whom in this case the duty of seeing that this regulation is complied with is placed. This is to be ascertained from the section headed Duties at the beginning of the regulations. The scheme of this section is that the duty of compliance is placed in the first instance on the occupier, which means the occupier of the shipbuilding yard : see Smith v. Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. (1). The occupier of the yard, of which the dry dock forms part, is, I think, the dock board, the second defendants. The liability imposed on the occupier is, however, subject to a proviso which, where it applies, creates what has been called a notional occupier of the dry dock, and puts on him the duty of compliance with the regulations, qualified by certain exceptions, which, so far as they relate to this case, relieve the notional occupier of some of these duties and impose them on the shipowner. The obscurity of this proviso is such that two decisions of the Court of Appeal, Wilkinson v. Rea, Ltd. (2), and Hartwell v. Grayson Rollo & Clover Docks, Ltd. (3), have not been able to do much to elucidate it. Obscurity is, perhaps, not quite the right word, for as a piece of English the proviso is intelligible enough. The trouble is that the draughtsman has legislated only for an assumed state of affairs in which more than one ship is never being repaired in a dry dock at the same time, and in which a shipowner never repairs his own ship and no-one repairs it except under contract with him, and he never contracts with more than one person at a time. When these assumptions break down, as they do in this case, it is difficult, if not impossible, to apply the proviso. Accordingly, I should not feel under any duty to search for a notional occupier, because I am satisfied that, if I found him, I should not be able to say that the regulations pointed to him with sufficient clarity to enable me to impose liability on him. In this regard, and, indeed, throughout this judgment, in construing these regulations I follow the principle recently applied to the Factories Acts by Lord Simonds in London & North Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (4), and by Somervell, L.J., in Franklin v. Gramophone Co. (5). This principle was expressed by Somervell, L.J., as follows ([1948] 1 All E.R. 359):

> " Although we are dealing here with a civil action, it is one which has to be based on a breach of a statute which imposes penalties. It would, I think, be sufficient for the employers if the court came to the conclusion that there was ambiguity or that the liability alleged under the section was not clear or that the conclusion to which I have, on the whole, come was a reasonable interpretation."

But the two defendants with whom I am now concerned are not in any event notional occupiers, and what I have to consider is whether the section headed Duties succeeds in imposing liability on them. I shall take the second defendants, the dock board first. The argument which seeks to impose liability on the board can be divided into two stages. The first stage is that where at any given moment there is more than one person who is executing repairs to the ship in dry dock under contract with her owner, there can be no notional occupier : see per Lord Oaksey, L.J., in Hartwell v. Grayson Rollo & Clover Docks, Ltd. (3) ([1947] K.B. 912). The second stage is that, where there is no notional occupier, the duty of compliance with the regulations remains with the actual occupier of the yard. It is implicit in this argument, and it is, I think, clear, that, although the proviso by its words goes no further than to impose duties on the notional occupier of the dry dock which it creates, it must by necessary implication lift from the shoulders of the actual occupier of the yard those duties which in respect of the dry dock it imposes on the notional occupier. The repairer is deemed to be the occupier in the place of the actual occupier ; it is not intended that an actual and a notional occupier should co-exist. Thus, when the proviso comes into operation the dock board is freed.

The question I have to determine is what is the event or condition precedent the fulfilment of which brings the proviso into operation. So far as the express language goes, the event is " when a ship is being repaired in public dry dock " and nothing more, but the draughtsman has, nevertheless, assumed that whenever a ship is being repaired in dry dock there will always be a single repairer who can be identified as the notional occupier. Does this assumption impose a second condition precedent on the operation of the proviso ? Can I construe the proviso as if it read : " when a ship is being repaired in dry dock and when there is a person who contracts . . ." ? I do not think that I can. When an assumption essential to the operation of a statutory provision breaks down, the court, which is charged merely with the duty of interpretation, has no power to fill the void. The very fact that the Secretary of State has so evidently not contemplated the possibility that there might be more than a single repairer means that what he would have done if he had contemplated it can only be the subject of speculation. If I were to speculate, counsel for the dock board has given me a number of cogent reasons for thinking that the Secretary of State would not have intended that liability should revert to the dock board. The one that impresses me most is the absurdity of supposing that the liability of the dock board should appear and disappear in the manner of the Cheshire cat, dependent on whether more than one person were, or, alternatively, no person was, at any given moment under contract to repair the ship. But, in whichever direction speculation might lead me, I am satisfied that I should have no right as a result of it to re-fashion the words of the proviso so as to impose liability on the dock board. I think that this follows from the usual principles of construction applicable to an ordinary statute as set out, for example, in the speech of EARL LOREBURN, in Bristol Guardians v. Bristol Waterworks Co. (6) ([1914] A.C. 388), and a fortiori from the principle applicable to penal statutes to which I have referred. In this result, I appear to be differing from that arrived at by STABLE, J., as shown in the report of Hartwell v. Grayson Rollo & Clover Docks Co. (3), and in the transcript of his judgment, with which I have been supplied, but his conclusion was obiter, for he had not the dock board before him and it was not indorsed by any of the judgments in the Court of Appeal. With the advantage that I have had of hearing a full argument from counsel for the dock board, I feel compelled, for the reasons I have given, to reach with deference a different conclusion.

The argument on the regulations against Alfred Holt & Co., the third defendants, whom for this purpose I assume to be the shipowners, rests on exception (b) to the proviso. I am satisfied that on the facts of this case the control of the ship, apart from any work of repair that was going on, remained with Alfred Holt & Co., and I am satisfied that the starboard opening was not one which was required to be used for the purpose of any repairs. Accordingly, it is argued that there is no need to search for a notional occupier, for the liability in respect of the opening in which the accident occurred is in any event imposed on the shipowner. It is true that the shipowner provided a protection to the opening which was removed by the first defendants, but that fact, it is said, cannot avail the shipowner unless the first defendants were "the occupier," and on no view of the proviso could the first defendants be the occupier, since they had not contracted with the owner. If I had regard to the bare language of the exception this argument would succeed, but I must have regard also to the intention behind the proviso and its exceptions in so far as that can be inferred from the language of the section as a whole. I think that the proviso in relation to exception (b) is intended to create a division of responsibility between a single repairer, who is deemed to be "the occupier," and the shipowner. Just as the proviso assumes that whenever a ship is being repaired there will be only a single repairer, so also, in my judgment, it assumes that whenever there is a "main repairer" he will be under contract with the owner and not with anybody else. I use the term "main repairer" because the words "contracts with the owner" are, I think, an attempt to distinguish between the main repairer or contractor and his sub-contractors, the draughtsman supposing that by this device he would arrive at a satisfactory description of a single repairer. I cannot think that it is material to the definition of notional occupier whether a main repairer contracts with the owner or not. Nor can I think that, if there was more than one main contractor, it was intended that for the purposes of exception (b) they should fall into two classes, with one of which (that with which he had contracted) the owner should divide the responsibility, and for the other of which (that with which he had not contracted, and upon which, therefore, he could not have imposed terms and from which he could not have obtained any indemnity) he should assume all responsibility. The assumption underlying exception (b) is, therefore, that wherever there is a main repairer he will be "the occupier" there referred to. In the first instance he will be responsible only for the protection of those openings which are required for the purposes of the repairs, but, if he removes any protection provided by the shipowner for any other opening, he shall be responsible for its replacement, thus impliedly exonerating the shipowner from further responsibility. This assumption breaks down in relation to Cammell Laird because, though a main repairer, they were one of several and they did not contract with the owner. The breakdown of the assumption makes it impossible for me to say how the Secretary of State would have intended to deal with the uncontemplated contingency of a main repairer who was not the occupier.

I do not think that the shipowner's case on this point is as strong as the similar case of the dock board. There are in exception (b) words which, applied literally, impose liability on him, but where a fundamental assumption underlying the exception has been vitiated I cannot feel reasonably sure that a literal application of the words used would achieve the result intended. Indeed, I strongly suspect that they would not, for I can see no reason for making the shipowner responsible for the misdeeds of some repairers and not of others. Accordingly, I come to the conclusion that in relation to the shipowner's liability also there is ambiguity and that the liability alleged is not clear. That is sufficient for the third defendants, and I think that the claim against them fails. I do not, therefore, need to inquire whether the willingness of these defendants to identify themselves with the shipowner is something on which I can safely act within the principle of Royster v. Cavey (7).

I appreciate that this judgment, if it is right, means that in many, perhaps most, cases of ship-repairing work in dry docks, the regulations will be a dead letter. This is a result which follows from the application of the principle that legislation of this character to be effective must be clearly expressed, and I regard it as on the whole less disturbing than the prospect that workmen, shipowners, repairers and dock owners should have to elucidate piecemeal and at great expense from one court after another, as they have started to do in Wilkinson v. Rea (2) and Hartwell v. Grayson Rollo & Clover Docks Co. (3), the extent of their rights and liabilities. A simple alternative, and one which I hope will commend itself to the Secretary of State if he thinks it important in the public interest to regulate work in dry docks, is that he should employ somebody with some knowledge of the conditions under which that work is done to draft a more comprehensible section. Meanwhile, and unless and until that is done, it is satisfactory to reflect that workmen will continue to enjoy the not inconsiderable degree of protection which is given to them by the Factories Act, 1937, generally and by the nature of an employer's duties at common law.

I consider finally the plaintiff's claim under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 26 (1). Counsel for the plaintiff said that he desired to pursue this claim against the second defendants only, namely, the dock board. Counsel for the second defendants had a number of answers to it in law, but I need not consider them as I can deal with it shortly on the facts. The obligation is to provide and maintain safe means of access to any place at which any person has at any time to work. Treating the place at which the plaintiff had to work as being the aft end of the port tank opening, I have already found that there was a safe means of access to that place round the outside of the port opening. It may well be that where there are two routes to a place of work, each equally likely to attract a workman, the section is not complied with unless both are made safe, but where, as in this case, there is one safe route and the workman chooses another, which it cannot reasonably be anticipated that he would choose, I do not think there can be any obligation in respect of the second route. The matter can be tested on the facts of this case by inquiring whether, if the plaintiff had injured himself because the space between the lids was in darkness, he could properly have complained of the lack of light in it. I do not think that he could. I hold that, whether or not s. 26 puts any duty on the dock board, there has been no breach of it. There will be judgment for the plaintiff against the first defendants for £4,500 with costs, and judgment for the second and third defendants against the plaintiff, with costs in each case.

[On the question of costs the plaintiff argued that the first defendant should be ordered to pay the costs awarded to the second and third defendants. After hearing counsel for the plaintiff, Devlin, J., said :] In this case I do not think I can make any special order with regard to the costs. It is a novel proposition that if a plaintiff has acted on an authority decided by the court in bringing his action instead of merely acting upon the advice of counsel, he should receive some special consideration under the Bullock or *Besterman principle. I do not think I can adopt it. I do not think merely because the plaintiff has acted very reasonably in the light of the authorities in joining the second and third defendants I can, therefore, say that, since, in my judgment, I have taken a different view of the law, the first defendant ought to be made to pay for that. Nor do I think I can attach any real importance to the suggestion that in their arguments counsel for the second and third defendants may have blamed one another in construing the regulations. I think it obviously follows that when counsel is advancing his particular construction it is naturally one which exonerates his own client, but it may well be one which throws blame on one of the other parties, and I do not think that is a matter which I ought to apply as a principle. I think the true position here is simply that, if my judgment is right, the plaintiff took a wrong view of the regulations, and acting—very properly, of course—but acting on that wrong view he joined the second and third defendants. It is extremely unfortunate that the plaintiff should have to bear the costs, but that is a misfortune which may fall on any member of the public when the court is concerned with construing obscure regulations. I do not think, in applying the principle which was set out in Hartwell v. Grayson Rollo & Clover Docks Co. (3) and Hong v. A. & R. Brown (8), and exercising my discretion in accordance with the judgments in those cases, I can fairly say it would be reasonable to penalise the first defendants by making them bear the costs of the second and third defendants. I think I would be only yielding to my natural sympathies in acting on the ground that where costs have been unfortunately thrown away owing to the obscurity in public legislation the first defendants should bear the burden. I think I should be only yielding to temptation if I made the order on that ground, and I do not think it a proper case in which I should exercise my discretion. Order accordingly.

PROBATE MOTION.

PEARCE, J. held that a codicil signed in the company of and subscribed by a blind man was not signed " in the presence of " the blind man, nor was he a "witness," within the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9. The facts appear in the judgment.

Hollins for the applicant (the widow of the testator and executrix of the codicil).

Wigan for the respondent (a beneficiary under a second codicil).

PEARCE, J. : The court is naturally loth to upset the wishes of a testator, but the requirements of the Wills Act, 1837, have to be complied with. Section 9 of the Act provides :

> " No will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing, and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned ; (that is to say), it shall be signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction ; and such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time, and such witnesses shall attest and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary."

Was this codicil signed " in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time," and did such witnesses " attest and subscribe " the codicil ? I am satisfied on the evidence that two persons, a man and his wife, were in the room with the testator when the codicil was signed and that both persons subscribed it. But the man was blind. He had been blinded 18 months before, in his middle age. He was, therefore, not so clever in his remaining faculties as people who have been born blind and had many years of affliction to train their other senses. His evidence was honest, but he admitted that he relied on presumption in regard to several matters that happened. On his evidence alone, without that of his wife, I should feel no certainty whether the document had been signed by the testator and the wife, nor would he be able to identify the document.

There is no direct authority on the capacity of a blind man to witness a will. The normal meaning of " attesting " is testifying or bearing witness to something, and the normal meaning of " witness " is one who is a spectator of an incident or one who is present at an incident. Is mere presence, without the faculty of sight, enough to constitute a person a " witness " for the purposes of s. 9 ? And is an act which he cannot see done " in his presence " ? The object of the Act is clear. One witness is not enough. The presence of two witnesses is made necessary to give certainty and avoid fraud. In the light of commonsense and without any authority I should be inclined to hold that for the purposes of the Act a " witness " means one who, in regard to things audible, has the faculty of hearing, and, in regard to things visible, has the faculty of seeing. The signing of a will is a visible matter, and, therefore, I think a will is not signed "in the presence of" a blind person, nor is he a "witness" for the purposes of the section. If, in peculiar circumstances, a blind man can be a witness to the signature of a will and it can be truly said to be signed in his presence, I do not think that the circumstances in this particular case are such as to lead to that conclusion.

I am confirmed in this view by the dicta in various cases which counsel for the respondent has put before me. In Hudson v. Parker (1) DR. LUSHINGTON A was considering the question of acknowledgment, and he there said (1 Rob. Eccl. 23):

> "The words of which we now wish to understand the meaning, are the following—'such signature shall be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time.' The previous part of the clause having required the signature to be affixed 'at B the foot of the will,' the section goes on—'and such witnesses shall attest, and shall subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation shall be necessary.' First then, as to the plain meaning of these words, 'that the signature of the testator shall be made in the presence of two witnesses,' will the statute be satisfied, if the signature be made in their presence, if they are in ignorance of the fact? I am of opinion, C under such circumstances that the statute is not complied with. It is obvious, that the solution of this question must mainly depend on the meaning which the legislature intended to convey by the use of the word 'presence,' in this and in the other clauses of the statute. What could possibly be the object of the legislature, except that the witnesses should see and be conscious of the act done, and be able to prove it by their own D evidence:—if the witnesses are not to be mentally, as well as bodily, present, they might be asleep, or intoxicated, or of unsound mind. Again, how is the signature so made to be proved, except by parol evidence?—to exclude which was one great object of the statute. In support of this view of the question, let us call to mind how the word 'presence' is received in its common acceptation:—loquendum est ut vulgus, says LORD COKE. If E in the course of common conversation a person wishes to support the truth of a statement, does he not say—'such a one was present, and he will vouch for the truth'?; if a statement be questioned, does not a person say 'I was present and can attest its correctness,' and does not the whole world understand by this, mental, not bodily presence? Would not a contrary construction lead to absurdity, and defeat the plain intention of the F statute?"

Later in his judgment he used these words (ibid., 35):

> "The witnesses are to see the signature made or acknowledged, because they are to attest it and to bear witness thereof; . . . but they cannot equally depose to the signature of the testator being made or acknowledged G in their presence, unless they see the act."

Then he said (ibid., 36): ". . . they must see the act done in order to attest it." Quoting from a judgment of PATTESON, J., in Burdett v. Spilsbury, Skynner v. Spilsbury (2) (10 Cl. & Fin. 394), dealing with a signature to a power under the Statute of Frauds, DR. LUSHINGTON said (ibid., 37):

> "'Now the fair meaning of the previous words, "in the presence of three H or more credible witnesses" must be, that three or more credible persons should see what is done'."

Finally, in giving the reasons why he held that in that particular case there had been no proper execution, he said (ibid., 40):

> "Lastly: because the witnesses never saw, or indeed could see the signature, of which there was no acknowledgment unless constructive."

Throughout his observations in that case DR. LUSHINGTON emphasised the necessity for seeing.

That case was followed in In the Goods of Gunstan, Blake v. Blake (3), in which SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (7 P.D. 107) :

> "The question, then, arises whether the testatrix acknowledged her signature before the witnesses. What is in law a sufficient acknowledgment A under the statute ? What I take to be the law is correctly laid down in JARMAN ON WILLS, 4th ed., p. 108, in the following terms : 'There is no sufficient acknowledgment unless the witnesses either saw or might have seen the signature, not even though the testator should expressly declare that the paper to be attested by them is his will' ; and I may add, in my opinion, it is not sufficient even if the testator were to say, 'My signature B is inside the paper,' unless the witnesses were able to see the signature. There is a great deal of authority on this point, several cases are referred to in the note to the passage which I have read, but I think it is sufficient to mention three cases only. The first is Hudson v. Parker (1), where the matter is most elaborately discussed by DR. LUSHINGTON. He tells us what in his view is the plain meaning of acknowledging a signature in the presence C of witnesses ; he says, 'What do the words import but this ? "Here is my name written, I acknowledge that name so written to have been written by me ; bear witness." How is it possible that the witnesses should swear that any signature was acknowledged unless they saw it ?' "

BRETT, L.J., said (ibid., 113) :

> D "When you find that in order to make the signature sufficient the witness must see the person sign, so when a signature is to be acknowledged they must see that there is a signature, and the testator must then in their presence say something equivalent to 'That is my signature' so that if they do not have the opportunity of seeing the signature, even if he say before them, 'My signature is in this instrument,' that will not do. That I take to be the decision of Hudson v. Parker (1).

E HOLKER, L.J., said (ibid., 116) :

> "It is clear that good sense requires that the acknowledgment to which the witnesses are to bear testimony should be an acknowledgment of the signature seen or capable of being seen by the witnesses. Although the words of the statute are 'such witnesses shall attest the will' and not F 'the signature,' it seems to me that it comes to the same thing, for when the document is properly signed or acknowledged in the presence of the witnesses, it becomes a will. So to my mind, to bear testimony to a will is the same thing as to bear testimony to the signature."

All these Lords Justices seem to me to attach importance to the fact of a G signature being seen. It is argued by counsel for the respondent that those are cases of acknowledgment of a signature and that they differ from cases of a signing of a signature, but I see no logical reason to distinguish between those two things. Counsel also relies on Newton v. Clarke (4), but that case has not a direct bearing on this point, and, like the cases I have cited, it is useful only by inference. It is clear, I think, from Hudson v. Parker (1), that DR. LUSHINGTON did not wholly agree with the decision in Newton & Thomas v. Clarke (4), H and, so far as one is drawing inferences from the cases, I think that inferences drawn from Hudson v. Parker (1) are more cogent than those derived from Newton & Thomas v. Clarke (4).

In Brown v. Skirrow (5) the headnote reads :

> "Where a testatrix signed her will in a shop, and one witness, who saw her sign, attested it, but the other witness being at the time when the testatrix and first witness signed engaged at the other side of the shop > with a person who stood between him and the testatrix, did not see them sign and did not know nor have the opportunity of knowing anything about what they had been engaged upon until after they had signed, when he was asked to be a witness. Held, That the testatrix did not sign 'in the presence' of the second witness."

So far as that case bears on the problem before me it tells against the validity of this codicil. It is interesting that in that case GORELL BARNES, J., during A the argument propounded the question whether a blind person could witness a will, but unfortunately he did not give the answer to it.

After considering all the cases that have been cited to me, and getting as much advantage as I can from any of them, I think that when one of the witnesses is blind the will has not been signed "in his presence," and he is not able to attest it. B
In the particular circumstances of this case (if I am wrong in thinking that a blind man is always unable to witness a will), the circumstances are not such as to make it possible to say that the blind man was a witness and that the signing of the will was done "in his presence." The codicil was, therefore, not made in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, and I pronounce against it.

Order accordingly. C

Attachment of Debt—"Debt owing or accruing"—Money in hands of receiver for debenture holder—Debenture holders and preferential creditors not yet paid—R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1. E

On Jan. 1, 1948, a debenture holder of a limited company appointed a receiver and manager of the premises charged by the debentures. The receiver filed returns of receipts and payments for two periods of six months ending on June 30, 1948, and Dec. 31, 1948, respectively, showing F a balance in his hands of £891 1*s.* 4*d.*, out of which he expected to have to pay £425 to debenture holders, the costs and legal charges of the receivership (which were at present only estimated items) and a preferential claim for income tax. On Feb. 22, 1949, the receivership not having been terminated, a judgment creditor of the company served on the receiver an order nisi for the attachment of £559 13*s.*, or part of that sum, out G of the amount in the hands of the receiver, as a debt due by the receiver to the company.

HELD: a receiver for debenture holders is not a debtor to the company from time to time of the amount which might ultimately prove to be the balance in his hands after payment of preferential claims and of the principal and interest due to debenture holders; on Feb. 22, 1949, there H was no debt in praesenti; and, therefore, on that date there was no debt owing or accruing to the company from the receiver, within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, and the order nisi must be discharged.

TRIAL OF AN ISSUE between judgment creditors and a proposed garnishee.

Seabrook Estate Co., Ltd., the judgment creditors of the Hythe Golf Club Co., Ltd., obtained, under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, an order nisi for the attach-
B ment of debts due to the club company from one R. S. Ford, the receiver and manager of premises charged under debentures of the club company who had been appointed by a debenture holder. An order was made for the trial of an issue under R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 4, the judgment creditors, as the intended garnishors, to be the plaintiffs in the issue, and the receiver, as the intended garnishee, to be the defendant. The issue was whether on Feb. 22, 1949, the
C date on which the order nisi was served on the receiver by the judgment creditors, the receiver was a debtor of the club company. HALLETT, J., held that there was no existing debt on that date and discharged the order nisi. The facts appear in the judgment.

Monier-Williams for the judgment creditors.

Mattar for the receiver.

D HALLETT, J. : This is the trial of an issue between judgment creditors and a garnishee and the question which has to be tried has been pleaded as follows :

> "The above named plaintiffs affirm and the said defendant Reginald Severne Ford denies that the sum of £559 13*s.* or part thereof was at the > E time the said order nisi was served due from the said defendant to the said Hythe Golf Club Co., Ltd."

The order nisi was served on Feb. 22, 1949.

The point is a nice one and, although counsel on both sides have done their best to help their arguments with authority, I do not feel that any of the cases cited to me are of any real assistance. In order that a sum can be attached
F there must be an actual debt existing at the time the order is sought, though the debt need not be then payable. There has been a good deal of discussion and authority about the words " debts owing or accruing " [in R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1], but I think that the position is reasonably clear having regard to the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Webb v. Stenton (1). It is now well settled that a sum of money may properly be the subject of a garnishee order although
G the time for payment of it is in the future—solvendum in futuro—provided that it constitutes debitum in praesenti, viz., a sum of money the obligation to pay which is in existence at the date when the garnishee order is sought.

The facts in the present case are not in dispute. The Hythe Golf Club Co., Ltd., the judgment debtors, have been in a state of suspended animation for some time. On Nov. 3, 1922, they created some 40 debentures of £25 each
H and in respect of those debentures they now owe the sum of £300 and some interest. On Jan. 1, 1948, one of the registered debenture holders appointed Mr. Ford, the garnishee, as receiver and manager of the premises charged by the debentures. It was the duty of Mr. Ford, as receiver and manager, to collect and realise the assets, to pay out of the sums realised the preferential claims laid down by the relevant provisions of the Companies Act, 1929, to pay the debenture holders their principal and interest, and, having then discharged his duties as receiver and manager to the debenture holders, to terminate his receivership, no doubt paying over to the company, or to their liquidator if they had been wound up, the ultimate balance remaining in his hands. On Feb. 22, 1949, he had not arrived at that stage. He had filed with the appropriate authority the two returns required by s. 310 of the Companies Act, 1929, i.e., a return showing his receipts and payments for the first six months of his receivership, viz., up to June 30, 1948, and a return showing his receipts and payments for the second six months of his receivership, viz., up to Dec. 31, 1948, and it is common ground that at the material date, Feb. 22, 1949, the financial position was that shown by those two accounts. There was a balance in the hands of the receiver of £891 1*s.* 4*d.*, but it does not follow that that sum was owing by the receiver to the company.

On the contrary, it is plain from a perusal of these accounts that nothing had yet been paid in respect of either capital or interest due to the debenture holders. The payments which had been made do not appear to include certain other payments which might well be due to preferential creditors. Since the date of those two accounts, the receiver seems to have provided the prospective garnishors with some further information about the payments he anticipates he will have to make. He anticipates that he will have to pay debenture holders £425, that he will be entitled to certain costs in respect of his receivership, that certain legal charges in connection with his receivership will have to be defrayed, and that there will be a preferential claim for income tax. The document at which I am looking was furnished by the receiver in the course of these proceedings and is a mere estimate of what, at the time of drawing it up, he considered he would have to pay before he brought his receivership to an end. It is said by the judgment creditors that, if those anticipations are realised exactly, there will remain, when the receivership comes to an end, a sum of roughly £240 which will be payable to the company and which could, therefore, be the subject of a garnishee order. What, however, the judgment creditors have to establish is that on Feb. 22 there was a debt owing by the receiver to the company.

Counsel for the judgment creditors relies on O'Driscoll v. Manchester Insurance Committee (2) where an issue was tried by Rowlatt, J., whose decision was subsequently affirmed by the Court of Appeal. In that case, Dr. Sweeny, the judgment debtor, was a panel doctor who had done work under his agreement with the insurance committee. The committee had received funds with which to pay the panel doctors under contract to them and were indebted to Dr. Sweeny in respect of his work although the exact amount of their indebtedness would have to be calculated, their liability to pay the doctors being limited by the amount which they received from the National Insurance Commissioners. Rowlatt, J., held that the fact that a calculation would be necessary to ascertain the exact sum payable to the doctor did not prevent a garnishee order being made, and that the plaintiffs, the judgment creditors, were entitled to an order attaching all debts due and accruing to Dr. Sweeny up to Apr. 9, 1914 (the date of the garnishee order nisi) in respect of services rendered by him under the National Insurance Act, 1911. The case was referred by Rowlatt, J., to the master to ascertain what the amount of these sums was. O'Driscoll's case (2) is an authority, which is binding on me, for the proposition that, where a debt is established in praesenti, it is not sufficient objection to say that the exact amount of the debt will be the subject of a calculation which has not yet been made and, it may be, cannot yet be made. In the Court of Appeal Bankes, L.J., said ([1915] 3 K.B. 516) :

> " The matter is well put in the Annual Practice, 1915, p. 808 : ' But the distinction must be borne in mind between the case where there is an existing debt, payment whereof is deferred, and the case where both the debt and its payment rest in the future. In the former case there is an attachable debt, in the latter case there is not.' If, for instance, a sum of money is payable on the happening of a contingency, there is no debt owing or accruing. But the mere fact that the amount is not ascertained does not show that there is no debt."

In Re Cowans' Estate (3), which was reviewed in Webb v. Stenton (1), the receiver in an administration action had been ordered by the court to pay A to a legatee a certain sum quarterly out of moneys in or coming to his hands and judgment creditors of the legatee sought to attach that sum. There was careful and technical argument whether a receiver who had been ordered by the court to make such payments could be treated as a person owing a debt, and the court decided that he could. I cannot, however, find anything in that case which assists me in the present matter.

B The question I have to ask myself on the facts of this case is whether, although its payment might be deferred and its amount might not have been calculated and might, at that time, be incapable of calculation, there was, on Feb. 22, any existing debt from the receiver to the company. In my view, there was not. In my view, it is not correct to say that a receiver for debenture holders is a debtor to the company from time to time of such sum as may ultimately C prove to be the balance in his hand after payment of preferential claims and after the discharge of whatever may be due to debenture holders in respect of principal and interest. A time may come when the receiver for the debenture holders will become the debtor to the company, but I do not think that that time had arrived on Feb. 22, 1949. For these reasons, I hold that at the material date there was no debt owing or accruing from the receiver to the company D within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, and, accordingly, the order nisi must be discharged.

Order nisi discharged with costs.

RIDER v. METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), March 29, 30, 31, April 1, May 19, 1949.]

Waterworks—Repairs in highway—Obligation to reinstate pavement—Work of reinstatement taken over by highway authority—Damage due to negligent G reinstatement—Liability of undertaker—Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847 (c. 17), s. 32—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (c. 120), s. 114.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, s. 32: "When the undertakers open or break up the road or pavement of any street . . . they shall with all convenient speed complete the work for which the same shall be broken up, and fill in the ground, and reinstate and make good the H road or pavement . . . so opened or broken up . . . and shall, after replacing and making good the road or pavement which shall have been so broken up, keep the same in good repair for three months thereafter, and such further time, if any, not being more than twelve months in the whole, as the soil so broken up shall continue to subside." By the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 114: " . . . whenever the permanent surface or soil of any street is broken up or opened, it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which the same is situate, in case they think it expedient so to do, to fill in the ground and to make good the pavement or surface or soil so broken up or opened . . . instead of permitting such work to be done by the company or person by whom such surface or soil is broken up or opened ; and the expenses of filling in such ground, and of making good the pavement or soil so broken up or opened, shall be repaid, on demand, to the vestry or board by such company or person."

On July 8, 1944, the Metropolitan Water Board, acting under their statutory powers, broke up the surface of the pavement outside the plaintiff's house to carry out repairs to a stop-cock. After the repairs were completed, they refilled a hole two feet square and eighteen inches deep which they had excavated round the box and put on a temporary surface, leaving the renewal of the paving to be done by the highway authority to whom they sent a notice, pursuant to s. 30 of the Act of 1847, informing them that the surface of the public way had been disturbed and stating that immediate reinstatement was required. For many years previously the work of reinstatement had been done by the highway authority and, in answer to an inquiry by the Board in 1934 whether the work was done under contract or under s. 114 of the Act of 1855, the authority had replied that it was done under s. 114, and, on Oct. 16, 1934, the authority passed a resolution that the reinstatement of highways broken up by statutory undertakers having rights to open highways be carried out by the authority under s. 114 of the Act of 1855. In August, 1944, the highway authority renewed the surface of the pavement round the stop-cock box, but, as a result of their negligence in the laying of the topping, it disintegrated and the lid of the box projected above the surface of the pavement. On a foggy evening in December, 1946, the plaintiff tripped over the lid and was injured. In an action by the plaintiff against the Board for damages for negligence, the Board contended (a) that their duty under s. 32 of the Act of 1847 was only to make the pavement good and keep it in good repair for three months ; (b) that they were absolved from liability under s. 32 because the highway authority, in reinstating the surface of the pavement, had been acting under s. 114 of the Act of 1855. The plaintiff contended (a) that the Board's notice to the highway authority constituted an invitation to the authority to do the work at the Board's expense, and, accordingly, in undertaking the work, the authority were acting under a contract with the Board and not under s. 114 ; (b) that under s. 114 the Board were absolved from liability only where the whole of the work was done by the highway authority.

HELD : (i) the topping was never properly laid, and, therefore, there was a breach of the obligation to make good the pavement under s. 32 of the Act of 1847, and whether or not the topping disintegrated before the expiry of three months was immaterial.

Withington v. Bolton Borough Council ([1937] 3 All E.R. 108), applied.

(ii) on the facts of the case, the highway authority, in reinstating the surface of the pavement, were acting, not under a contract with the Board, but under s. 114 of the Act of 1855.

(iii) the obligation of the Board under s. 32 of the Act of 1847 was qualified by s. 114 of the Act of 1855, and the Board were absolved from liability where the work of reinstatement had been taken over by the highway authority.

Cressy v. South Metropolitan Gas Co. (1906) (94 L.T. 790), followed.

(iv) filling in the excavation and reinstating the pavement were two separate operations, and were referred to separately in ss. 32 and 114, and, therefore, the Board were absolved from their liability under s. 32 of the Act of 1847, even though they themselves performed the first operation and the highway authority undertook, under s. 114 of the Act of 1855, only the reinstatement of the pavement.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

In December, 1946, the plaintiff suffered injuries as a result of tripping over the lid of a stop-cock box which projected above the surface of the pavement. Two years earlier the defendants, the Metropolitan Water Board, after repairing the box, had filled in a hole which they had excavated round it, but the renewal of the paving was done by the highway authority, Wandsworth Borough Council. DEVLIN, J., found that the projection of the lid of the stop-cock box was due to the negligence of the highway authority in executing the work of reinstating the surface of the pavement, and he held that the highway authority, in doing this work, were acting under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 114, and not under a contract with the defendants, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable for the negligence. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 19. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. On July 8, 1944, the defendants, the Metropolitan Water Board, executed some alterations or repairs to a stop-cock box outside the plaintiff's house, No. 16, Montserrat Road, Putney. For this purpose they broke the tarred surface of the pavement around the box and excavated a hole two feet square by eighteen inches deep. After completion of the work of repair the hole was re-filled and consolidated by pounding and the surface was made good temporarily by laying gravel to a depth of four inches, it being intended to leave the renewal of the paving to the Wandsworth Borough Council who are the appropriate highway authority. The work was actually done by a firm of contractors called J. B. Edwards & Co., Ltd., employed by the Board, but it was supervised by two servants of the Board. Two days later, on July 10, 1944, the Board sent a notice to the Wandsworth Borough Council informing them that the surface of the public way had been disturbed and that it required immediate reinstating. In opening and breaking up the highway the Board were acting under powers contained in the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, an Act which, it is agreed, is incorporated in the special Act applicable to the Board. In serving the notice to which I have referred the Board were, at any rate as to the first part which gives notice of the fact of disturbance, acting under s. 30 of the Act. This section ordinarily requires the Board to give notice of opening or breaking up not less than three days before they begin the work, but it also provides that in cases of emergency the notice may be given as soon as possible after the beginning of the work. This was, apparently, treated both by the Board and by the council as a case of emergency, a term which was rather loosely interpreted in the conditions of 1944. As to the part of the notice which says that immediate reinstatement is required, this has been the subject of a dispute which I shall deal with hereafter. On Aug. 15, 1944, the council did the work of renewing the surface. The temporary surface of gravel was removed. The earth below was pounded and on it a tar bottom was laid, about 2½ to three inches thick. Then a topping of finer material was laid ; this was about half an inch thick and it was finished so that it was level with the top of the box lid. At about 5.30 p.m. on Dec. 29, 1946, the plaintiff, returning to his house on a very foggy night, tripped over the lid of the box and sustained injuries as a result of which he has brought this action. An inspection of the pavement made shortly after the accident showed that almost the whole of the topping had disappeared and that the lid projected from half an inch to seven-eighths of an inch above the surrounding pavement. The projection of seven-eighths of an inch was on the side from which the plaintiff approached at the time of the accident. I am satisfied that in this condition the lid constituted a danger on the highway. This was the view expressed at the time by the Board's foreman, Mr. Blunt, and by the council's inspector, Mr. Fogg, and I see no reason to differ from it.

The action is brought in negligence, as it must be, because the work was done pursuant to statutory authority. The complaint is in effect that the Board neglected the duty imposed on them by s. 32 of the Act of 1847 of making good the pavement which they had broken up. Counsel for the Board has admitted that they are liable for the negligence, if any, of their contractors, J. B. Edwards & Co., Ltd., and has also admitted, subject to a defence based on the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 114, that the Board are liable for the negligence, if any, of the council. Before me the plaintiff has contended that the work was done negligently in two respects. In the first place it is said that the soil filled in by J. B. Edwards & Co., Ltd., was not properly consolidated, with the result that by 1946 it had subsided, and that this subsidence was, at any rate, one of the causes of the exposure of the box lid. The second head of negligence relied on is the failure to lay the topping properly with the result that by 1946 it had disintegrated. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence, found that there was no negligence in the consolidation of the soil, but that there was negligence in the laying of the topping, and continued :] As the result of this negligence, the lid was exposed in such a manner as to render it a danger on the highway.

Before I consider the defence under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, s. 114, I shall dispose of two other minor defences. The first is an allegation of contributory negligence and of volenti non fit injuria. I think it is settled that the latter principle does not apply in a case of obstruction on the highway such as this. The authorities are collected in CLERK AND LINDSELL ON TORTS, 10th ed., p. 58. As to contributory negligence, it is true that the plaintiff knew of the exposed lid for some considerable time before the accident and that it was situated right opposite the centre of the entrance to his house, but in the ordinary way he did not come into contact with it, for he usually approached the entrance not from immediately opposite but from one side or the other. On the day of the accident there was a dense fog, which had caused him to find his way down Montserrat Road on the opposite side and then to turn and walk straight across. Usually the box, even at night, was rendered visible by street lighting, but on this day the fog concealed it. I am not satisfied that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence on this occasion. The second defence is that the Board's duty under s. 32 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, is not to make a permanent repair but to make good and keep in good repair for three months, and that the disintegration of the topping does not amount to a breach of this obligation. I need not inquire whether the topping disintegrated before the expiry of three months, because I think that the inference I should draw from the evidence is that the topping was never properly laid at all and, accordingly, that there was a breach of the obligation to make good. On this point I follow the reasoning in Withington v. Bolton Borough Council (1).

I turn now to the defence under s. 114 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. This section empowers the council in a case of this kind to do the work themselves, and, to use the words of the section :

> " . . . in case they think it expedient so to do, to fill in the ground and to make good the pavement . . . instead of permitting such work to be done by the company or person by whom such surface or soil is broken up or opened ; and the expenses of filling in such ground, and of making good the pavement or soil so broken up or opened, shall be repaid . . . by such company or person."

The Board contend that in August, 1944, the council were acting under this power, and, therefore, that, on the authority of Cressy v. South Metropolitan Gas Co. (2) and Brame v. Commercial Gas Co. (3), the Board are absolved from all liability under s. 32 of the Act of 1847 in respect of all the work done to the soil and pavement around the stop-cock. I regard the reasoning of these two decisions in the Divisional Court as binding on me, and I think that this reasoning establishes that the obligation under s. 32 of the Act of 1847 is qualified by s. 114 of the Act of 1855 and is to be read as if it were subject to the proviso " unless the local authority step in and do the work." Brame v. Commercial Gas Co. (3) makes it clear that this proviso is not satisfied unless and until the work is actually taken over by the council.

Counsel for the plaintiff makes two answers to this defence. The first is that the council were not, in fact, acting under s. 114 at all. The notice of July 10 informed the council that the pavement required immediate reinstating. This, it is argued, was an invitation to the council to do the work at the expense of the Board, the invitation was accepted by conduct, and as a result an ordinary contract came into being. I find that work of this sort has been done by the council for many years past. There is some evidence that in 1913 and 1914 it was being done under contract, but in 1933 and 1934, on the question being raised by the Board, the town clerk replied that the practice adopted by the council with regard to reinstatement of trenches was in pursuance of s. 114. The Board raised the point that this practice ought to be sanctioned by a resolution of the council, and, consequently, on Oct. 16, 1934, the council resolved that until further order the reinstatement of highways broken up or opened by statutory undertakers or public authorities having rights to open highways be carried out by the council in pursuance of the powers contained in s. 114. I cannot doubt that this resolution was communicated to the Board, and I think it shows that, at least from that time onwards, there was no intention on the part of either side to make any contract for the execution of work of this type. There was in force at the material time a schedule of charges agreed between the parties for work done by the council, but this is not inconsistent with the work being done under s. 114, for it is not unnatural that, when the section was so frequently in operation, the parties should agree on the amount of the expenses which could be recovered by the council thereunder. I hold that this answer is bad.

Since the only negligence I have found lies in the laying of the topping and since that work was actually done by the council, it would appear to follow that the Board are exonerated, but counsel for the plaintiff contends, and this is his second answer to the defence based on the section, that s. 114 applies to relieve the Board only if the whole of the work is done by the council. In the phrase " instead of permitting such work," the words " such work," he says, refer to the joint work of filling in the ground and making good the pavement, and the words " instead of permitting " imply a power to prevent. The council did not fill in the ground and, therefore, the Board were not prevented from doing the whole of the work, but only a part of it. I accept the view that the filling in was done by the Board's contractors and that it was done not, as was argued on behalf of the Board, as a temporary measure for which the council must ultimately assume responsibility, but as permanent work. The evidence shows that the council were concerned only with the reinstatement of the surface. In the notice of July 10 they were not informed of the depth of the excavation. Their work consisted of removing the temporary surface of the gravel and beneath it they expected to find a firm base on which to lay their permanent surface. The responsibility for creating that firm base belonged to the Board. The pounding which the employees of the council did was intended primarily to make good any disturbance to the base caused by the work of removing the gravel. There were in practice two separate operations, one of filling in the excavation and the other of reinstating or making good the tar pavement. They are not unified merely by reason of the fact that one is built on the other. Section 114 of the Act of 1855 refers in its natural and ordinary construction to these two operations separately, and so does s. 32 of the Act of 1847. I see no reason why the implied proviso in s. 32 should not apply to the second operation which the council actually did. Accordingly, I hold that this defence succeeds. There will be judgment for the Board.

[Court of Appeal (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ.), December 7, 8, 9, 1948, March 3, 4, 7, May 11, 12, 27, 1949.]

Compulsory Purchase—Mines—Coal mine—Acquisition of interest—Compensation—Disposal as between beneficial interests under settlement—Coal Act, 1938 (c. 52), sched. III, pt. IV, para. 21 (2).

Costs—Compensation—Coal mine—Acquisition of interest—Application to court to determine manner in which compensation to be held and disposed of—Coal Act, 1938 (c. 52), sched. III, pt. IV, para. 22 (1).

Compensation under the Coal Act, 1938, ss. 6 and 7, became payable in respect of certain coal holdings which were subject to the trusts of a settlement, and this application was made to the court for directions as to the disposal thereof under para. 21 of sched. III to the Act as between the beneficial interests. The plaintiff, G., was the tenant for life in possession on whose death there was a limitation to his first and every other son in tail male according to seniority. In default of a son of G., who had no son at the date of the application, M. was presumptive life tenant in remainder, on whose death the funds devolved in tail male on M.'s sons, I. and C., in order of seniority. The life tenant was not impeachable for waste. G. argued that the amount of the compensation payable represented the aggregate of the values as at the vesting date (July 1, 1942) placed by the valuation board on the estimated royalty income which might have been expected to have been received from each holding during the period of its estimated life. To dispose of the compensation, therefore, it was said that it should be divided into a number of sums each equal to the value as at the vesting date placed on a corresponding estimated annual royalty. Each sum should then be accumulated until the date on which the annual payment which it represented would have fallen to be made, and its capital and accumulation should then be divided between income and capital according to the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 47, i.e., in this case in the proportion of three to one respectively. It was argued for the remainderman that the proper method of disposal was that expounded in Re Leeds (Duke), ([1947] 2 All E.R. 200).

A HELD : (i) the scheme adopted in Re Leeds (Duke) was in accordance with para. 21, but that propounded by G. was not because it did not give to the beneficiaries "the like benefit . . . as they might lawfully have had" inasmuch as the amount which a life tenant would receive was unaffected by the fact that future income from coal royalties was discounted at a higher percentage than that earned by money in trustee B securities, whereas G.'s scheme caused the earlier life tenants to benefit by that fact.

(ii) the effect of proviso (ii) to para. 21 (2) was that (a) where the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 47, would apply to cause the setting aside of a proportion of the abated royalty equivalent as capital, the proper proportion (in this case one-quarter) must be set aside, but the amount so set aside C must be limited to the amount of the capital supplement in that year ; (b) the tenant for life must be given the income of the compensation during any period notwithstanding that the holding was not estimated to produce any income during that period ; and (c) in a case where no estimate could be made of the date of working of a holding, the trustee must distribute the income.

D Re Leeds (Duke) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 200) and Re Blandy-Jenkins ([1948] 1 All E.R. 582), approved.

It was argued by the National Coal Board that it was only liable under para. 22 (1) for costs of the application at first instance and there was no power to order it to pay the costs of the appeal.

HELD : (i) the costs of the appeal were costs incurred in connection E with an application and were reasonably incurred within the paragraph, and, therefore, they should be paid by the National Coal Board.

(ii) "costs reasonably incurred" within the meaning of the paragraph were the costs of all parties as between party and party.

APPEAL by the plaintiff, the tenant for life in possession, from an order of JENKINS, J., dated June 11, 1948.

The plaintiff made an application on an originating summons to JENKINS, J., for directions as to the disposal of compensation payable under the Coal Act, 1938, ss. 6 and 7, in respect of the acquisition of interests in coal and coal H mines which were subject to the trusts of a settlement. In effect, the application was an attempt to secure the approval of the court of a scheme of disposal under para. 21 (2) of sched. III to the Act which was essentially different from that approved in Re Leeds (Duke) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 200) and Re Blandy-Jenkins ([1948] 1 All E.R. 582). JENKINS, J., while regarding himself bound by the principle of the earlier decisions, considered the scheme on its merits and rejected it. The Court of Appeal now also rejected the scheme and indicated that it considered that the scheme adopted in the earlier cases was in accordance with the provisions of para. 21 (2). The relevant facts are summarised in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27. EVERSHED, L.J., read the following judgment of the court (written by SOMERVELL, L.J.). The plaintiff in the present proceedings, being tenant for life under a settlement which comprised coal holdings compulsorily acquired under the Coal Act, 1938, took out an originating summons for the determination of the question how the compensation received under B that Act should be disposed of by the trustees under para. 21 of sched. III to the Act.

The construction and effect of that paragraph had been considered by the learned judge from whose decision this appeal is brought in two previous cases, Re Duke of Leeds (1) and Re Blandy-Jenkins (2). All interested parties were represented and such provisions of the settlement as are relevant are set out C in the learned judge's judgment and need not be repeated. Counsel for the life tenant submitted to the learned judge a method of disposing of the compensation money radically different from that adopted by the learned judge in the Duke of Leeds case (1). The learned judge, while regarding himself bound by his previous decisions in respect of any matter of principle involved in those decisions, considered the argument on its merits and rejected it. D The same, or substantially the same, submission was made by counsel for the life tenant to this court which was, of course, free to consider the earlier decisions of Jenkins, J. In addition to what we may call the main submission, other questions arose, which we will consider and deal with later.

Under the Coal Act, 1938, the fee simple in all coal and mines of coal was vested in the Coal Commission as from July 1, 1942, the vesting date. The E compensation for the holding was to be a sum representing the value in the open market, arrived at in the following way. The Act, in s. 6 (3), provided that a sum of £66,450,000 should be the aggregate amount payable in respect of the coal hereditaments acquired. This, as is known, was arrived at on the basis, as settled by an arbitration, of 15 years' purchase of the average total royalty income. Under s. 6 (4) a central valuation board was to allocate this F sum among valuation regions covering the whole country. Individual holdings were then to be valued in the different regions on an open market basis. These individual valuations, if their total was more than the regional allocation, were adjusted down ; if less, as here, they were adjusted up, so that the regional allocation, no more and no less, was to be distributed to the owners. Claims had to be made in a prescribed form to which we refer later. The valuations G were to be made by regional valuation boards with a right of appeal to a referee. That is the scheme in broad outline. It is unnecessary to deal with it in greater detail as it is fully set out in the judgment of Jenkins, J., in the Duke of Leeds case (1).

We are concerned with para. 21 of sched. III to the Act which deals with the disposal of compensation as between beneficial interests in cases where H the holdings acquired were subject to a settlement. This paragraph is on lines similar to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 74, and the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 79. Apart from such statutory provisions money received on the sale of a wasting asset would become capital of the settlement. The present paragraph, like the sections referred to, is designed to give to the trustees a discretion to deal with the money so that the rights of tenants for life in successive years and the rights of remaindermen, inter se, in the compensation money shall bear as near as may be the same ratio to each other as if the asset had not been sold. Paragraph 21 (1) and (2) of sched. III is as follows :

> "(1) The compensation for a holding when paid by the Commission to the person entitled to receive it from them, including any sum paid on account thereof under para. 19 or 20 of this schedule, and the income A thereof, shall, in order to its being applied as compensation to the persons whose interests are comprised in the holding, be held and disposed of for the benefit of those persons, or their personal representatives or assigns, in accordance with the succeeding provisions of this paragraph. (2) In the case of a holding that consists of or comprises an estate or other interest subject to a settlement within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1925, B or to a trust for sale the proceeds whereof are subject to a settlement by way of succession, the trustees of the settlement or any court having jurisdiction in relation to the execution of the trusts of the settlement, and in the case of the court on the application of any beneficiary under the settlement, may require and cause the compensation, or the part thereof attributable to that estate or other interest, as the case may be, to be C laid out, invested, accumulated, and paid in such manner as, in the judgment of the trustees or of the court, as the case may be, will give to the beneficiaries under the settlement the like benefit therefrom as they might lawfully have had from that estate or other interest, or as near thereto as may be, regard being had to the terms of the settlement and to all relevant circumstances affecting the premises in which the holding D subsisted, including :—(a) the terms of any subsisting coal-mining lease and the operation of any provision therein contained as to undergettings, short workings, and other like matters ; (b) the period within which coal being worked might have been expected to be worked out or coal not being worked might have been expected to come into working and to be worked out ; and (c) the extent to which, having regard to those circumstances, E the premises ought to be regarded as property of a wasting character."

To understand the arguments it is necessary to set out the nature of the evidence before the court on which the learned judge's scheme and that of counsel for the tenant for life operate. Under the Coal (Valuation Procedure) Rules, 1938 (S.R. & O., 1938, No. 1592), coal owners had to submit estimates of the value of their various holdings on forms scheduled to the Order. It is F unnecessary to go into detail, but estimates of output and royalty income in future years had to be made and submitted covering the whole estimated life of the mine. The claims as so made out in respect of the present holdings went before the regional valuation board and in two cases there was an appeal to the referee. There were in some cases reductions, and we have an explanatory note from Mr. Lynch Blosse, mining engineer and adviser to the trustees and G the plaintiff, who attended the proceedings on their behalf. It is sufficient to say that in some cases with absolute accuracy and in others with substantial accuracy the court has before it the figures of estimated income for each year of the estimated lives of the different holdings on which the board or the referee based the amount of compensation awarded.

We will briefly illustrate the procedure by one or two examples. Those who H prepared the claim for one of the holdings, G.M. 740, estimated, for reasons that are given, nine successive variations in income over 100 years, the estimated life of the mine. For example, a substantial drop in output was estimated in 1952 on the partial exhaustion of the five seams. In 2020 the existing lease expired. The board accepted the nine periods and made some, though not large, reductions in the figures submitted. For example, the average royalty figure under the existing lease was taken in the claim at 8*d*. The board reduced this to 7.648*d*. When the lease had to be renewed in 2020 the board forecast a reduction of royalty rate to 6*d*. Before considering the method by which the compensation figure is calculated, those figures, as accepted by the board, represent, as it seems to us, evidence of the "benefit" which beneficiaries in successive years might "lawfully have had" from this holding, assuming there was no question of setting aside as capital a proportion of the royalty income. If a proportion had to be set aside this would have to be taken into account. In arriving at the figure to be paid as compensation these annual sums were discounted back to the vesting date at varying percentage rates. For example, the "certain rents" were discounted back over the 100 years at rates varying from 6 per cent. to 8 per cent., the surplus income at rates varying from 8 per cent. to 10 per cent. It will be seen that this whole method differs from the method of arriving at a purchase price by taking so many years' purchase of an estimated future income. The estimated variations in future years, the varying dates at which current leases expired, might anyhow have made such a method difficult to apply. It also seems a reasonable surmise that the method laid down was adopted in order to assist trustees in carrying out the task imposed on them by para. 21 of sched. III to the Act. There was no evidence how the discounting percentages were arrived at. It seems again a reasonable surmise that they were worked out so as to produce in the case of an average royalty holding a figure in the neighbourhood of fifteen years' purchase of the average income which was the basis of the global figure.

The results of these percentage reductions were shown in exhibits H.L.B.1 and H.L.B.2 in respect, not of individual holdings, but of the totals of the various holdings. The settlement being one in which one-quarter of the royalty income had to be set aside as capital money, the totals for each year are so divided between capital and income. The discounted value of an income sum of £19,666 for 1960 is £4,922, of an income sum of £10,805 for 2042 is £115. The sum of these figures so discounted represented the compensation. The difference between the learned judge's method and that submitted by counsel for the life tenant can be most easily stated by considering a case in which none of the royalty income has to be set aside as capital. We will assume such a case in which the whole life of the mine is covered by an existing lease with uniform terms and that on the evidence there was no ground for assuming any reduction of output. On this basis the estimate of income from the first to the last year will be the same, say £10,000. The learned judge, "assuming that the compensation moneys not distributed at any given moment will earn three per cent. (less income tax), would direct the trustees to distribute the available funds so that the same sum would be available in each year from the first to the last. There would be a uniform abatement of the estimated royalty income throughout the period" of the estimated life of the mine. In the case we have assumed, where no part of the income has to be set aside, the fund would then be exhausted. In other words, the compensation money has wasted as the mine was expected to waste. The sum available in each year is, of course, substantially less than the estimated royalty income, but on the learned judge's method the sum is the same sum in each year. Counsel's scheme can be illustrated by taking two years, say 1960 and 2000. In arriving at the compensation figure the £10,000 estimated royalty income for 1960 will have been discounted back to the vesting date at, say, about 7 per cent., and the figure for the year 2000 at about 9 per cent. We take approximate figures from the documents before us. These discounted figures for all the successive years of the life of the mine can be ascertained, their total making up the figure of compensation. Each of them on counsel's scheme is notionally segregated and invested. When the year for which a particular figure was estimated arrives the investments so earmarked are realised and distributed with the interest they have in fact earned. The tenant for life in 1960 will get the then value of the investments made with £10,000 discounted at 7 per cent. back to the vesting date, with actual accumulations from that date. The tenant for life in 2000 will get the value of the investments made with £10,000 discounted back at 9 per cent. with accumulations. It will at once be seen that under this system life tenants in the early years get a larger proportion of the estimated royalty income than life tenants in later years. Some figures were worked out in the course of the argument showing that in 1943 a life A tenant would get over two-thirds of the estimated royalty income, in 1964 about one-third, and in 1984 about one-sixth.

We agree with the learned judge that his method is, and counsel's is not, in accordance with the provisions of para. 21. The beneficiaries are to obtain "the like benefit . . . as they might lawfully have had" from the holding. One thing seems to us perfectly clear. In any given year the output of coal B on which the return to a tenant for life will depend is unaffected by the fact that, in arriving at an open market price for coal, future income from a source such as coal royalties is discounted at a far higher percentage than that earned by money in trustee securities, but in counsel's division of the compensation money the early life tenant benefits by this fact. It, therefore, as it seems to us, is not having regard to the benefit which would have been received if C there had been no sale, but is having regard to the amount of the purchase price referable to each successive year's estimated return. This is a wholly different conception, which words could easily have been found to express. We think the provision that regard is to be had to the period within which coal might have been expected to be worked out also supports the learned judge's view. If, as here, there is uncontradicted evidence that certain annual D sums may be anticipated over a period on the footing that the compulsory purchase had not taken place, then, to repeat the learned judge's language, "the sub-paragraph quite clearly points to a uniform abatement of the estimated royalty income throughout the period."

We would also record our agreement with the learned judge's view, as expressed in the Duke of Leeds case (1), that to decide otherwise would be E inconsistent with the decisions to which he refers on similar words in earlier enactments. We have nothing we wish to add on what is said about those decisions. The learned judge, in rejecting counsel's scheme, relied in part on the proviso (ii) of para. 21. It seems to us that the argument fails before that proviso is reached.

We will now deal with the other issues which do depend on the construction F of proviso (ii). We have described the first step in the learned judge's scheme by which the total compensation fund consisting of capital and assumed interest is spread over the life of the mine so as to secure a uniform abatement of estimated royalty income. How is regard to be had to a provision that a proportion of the royalty income arising in each year would have had to be set aside as capital ? Prima facie one would set aside the required fraction of G the sum allocated to each successive year. The two provisos on which the argument turns are as follows :

> "(i) where a payment on account of the compensation for the holding has been made under para. 19 of this schedule before the vesting date, the net income accruing to the trustees before the vesting date from the investment of the sum paid, up to an amount sufficient to make good to H the capital of the settlement the interest on that sum brought into account under para. 19 of this schedule against the capital of the compensation, shall be set aside as capital of the settlement ; (ii) subject as aforesaid no part of the income of the compensation shall be required or caused by virtue of this sub-paragraph to be set aside as capital of the settlement."

The purpose of proviso (i) is clear. Paragraph 19 (3) provides that a payment on account before the vesting date with interest at three per cent. less income tax up to that date is to be treated in account as a payment on account of the capital of the compensation. Proviso (i) follows logically on this provision. In considering the effect of proviso (ii) there are three cases: (1) when there is existing royalty income at the vesting date; (2) when the mine is not in working at that date, but is estimated to come into working at a certain year in the future; (3) where the coal is not in working and it is impossible to estimate a date, the coal being valued on an acreage basis.

A The learned judge expressed his opinion on proviso (ii) in the Duke of Leeds case (1) and also in Re Blandy-Jenkins (2). I will read a passage from the former case ([1947] 2 All E.R. 212):

> "If a proportion of the royalty income derived from the holding in any year, had it remained subject to the settlement instead of being compulsorily acquired, would, in view of the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 47, B have been liable to be set aside as capital money arising under the settlement, the like proportion (in this case one-fourth) of the abated royalty equivalent for the same year must be similarly set aside, but, in view of the prohibition against the capitalisation of income contained in the proviso to para. 21 (2) (which I regard as exempting the income of the compensation from accumulation except in so far as there may be an obligation to C accumulate by virtue of the actual limitations of the settlement itself in any particular case), not exceeding the amount, if any, of the capital supplement for that year. Any amounts so set aside and the future income thereof will, thenceforth, cease to be subject to the special provisions applicable to the capital and income respectively of the compensation."

In the course of the hearing we felt some doubt as to the scope and effect of D this proviso, particularly in the case of a mine estimated to come into working at a future date. The hearing was, therefore, adjourned in order that these matters should be fully argued. Counsel for the trustees submitted, first, that the learned judge, in coming to the conclusion as set out in the paragraph read, was misconstruing the words "subject as aforesaid." The learned judge, as is clear from other passages, read them as referring and referring only to E proviso (i). Counsel submitted that they referred to the whole of the sub-paragraph. This does not seem to us a possible construction. The wording of the proviso itself shows, we think, that it is intended to prohibit something which might have been proper or thought to have been proper under the sub-paragraph apart from the proviso. On this point counsel for the tenant for life in remainder referred us to the summary of his argument in Re Blandy-F Jenkins (2) as set out by JENKINS, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 589). That represented the argument that he desired to put before us in this case. The learned judge accepted that argument and we agree with his conclusion.

We have so far been assuming a mine in working at the vesting date. We will now consider a mine estimated to come to working at a certain year in the future. There is a "dead" period. It may be said that interest accumulated G over the dead period is not set aside finally and irrevocably as the capital of the settlement. The argument can be well illustrated by a holding B.C.10 in the present case. The coal was expected to come into working in 1958 and to be exhausted by 1968. Any income, therefore, accumulated up to 1958 would be distributed, subject possibly to retention of one-quarter by 1968. The accumulations as such would be set aside finally as capital of the settle-H ment. In certain contexts the words being considered might be construed as not covering accumulations during the "dead" years for the reason indicated above. On the other hand, the words "setting aside as capital of the settlement" are clearly capable of covering an accumulation in the dead period irrespective of whether the "capital" so accumulated may subsequently in whole or in part be distributed in annual payments to tenants for life. The same words occur at the end of proviso (i). There, as it seems to us, they are plainly used to cover what is accumulated irrespective of whether it may be in whole or in part distributed annually after the vesting date to tenants for life. The words in proviso (i) are applicable although the mine may be expected to be worked out in three years, and there may have been no proportion of royalty income to be set aside. The words cannot be limited under proviso (ii) in a way which plainly cannot apply to the same words in proviso (i). We agree with the learned judge that the effect of the proviso is to give the tenant A for life the income of the compensation fund over the dead period. When the estimated period of working arrives, the ordinary scheme will apply. In a case where no estimate can be made of the date of working, the trustees must clearly distribute the income. There is only one very small sum of this kind in this case, and no point has been taken with regard to it. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider what other problems, if any, might be B raised with regard to sums of this kind. In the Duke of Leeds case (1) JENKINS, J., said that the method he adopted was not necessarily the only possible method of giving effect to the paragraph. This may be so. The question in the present appeal is whether the order of the learned judge is in accordance with the paragraph. In our view, it is, and we would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

C [There was then argument as to costs.]

LORD GREENE, M.R. : We are all of opinion that this is a case where the court has jurisdiction to order the National Coal Board to pay these costs. The argument of counsel for the Coal Board was to the effect that the application to the Court of Appeal was not requisite because the matter had been decided D by the trial judge, that all that was requisite was to take out a summons in the Chancery Division and to carry it as far as the court of first instance, and that after that there was no power to charge costs on the National Coal Board. In my opinion, that is much too narrow a reading of the provisions of para. 22 (1) of sched. III. The relevant words are :

> "... costs reasonably incurred ... in connection with ... any > E application to the court that may be requisite."

Leaving aside for the moment that there were other decisions of the court, namely, of JENKINS, J., already in existence, an application to the court was clearly requisite. The argument of counsel for the Coal Board would mean that the costs of an appeal against the decision on that application would not be the costs "in connection with" the application. I cannot read the words of F the legislature in that narrow sense. The object clearly was to leave the recipient of the compensation in such a position that he would get his compensation free of the expense of ascertaining what he was to get. The legislature, in my opinion, must have realised that any application to the court might be appealed and that any costs incurred in connection with such an application would include costs of an appeal provided one requisite is there. The overriding provision, which G is the safeguard of the Coal Board against frivolous appeals or anything of that kind, is the provision that the costs must have been reasonably incurred. If the incurring of costs of an appeal is an incurring of costs in connection with an application to the court, which I think it is, the question then is whether on the facts of each individual case the costs of such an appeal were reasonably incurred. The language of the schedule dealing with the distribution of compensation leaves H a considerable latitude of discretion, and JENKINS, J., said more than once, and I am sure he was right in so saying, that it does not follow that one method is the only method of dealing with a given situation. That being so, the question here was whether a different method from that adopted by JENKINS, J., in the previous cases was within the four corners of the Act. That seems to me to be a fair matter for an application notwithstanding the decisions of JENKINS, J. JENKINS, J., is the only judge who has had to deal with these very complicated and very difficult provisions of this Act. It is not like a case where you have decisions of six judges of first instance all deciding independently of one another. It is a case where one judge, following what he had already done before in two cases, has come to a decision. It is clear to my mind that if one went back to the first of those decisions the costs of an appellant in such a case would have been costs in connection with the application to Jenkins, J., and it would have been reasonable for the appellant to carry the matter of this very complicated Act at any rate as far as the Court of Appeal. Having regard to the fact that the only decision is a decision of a judge of first instance and that the matter is one of very great complication and one which, in my opinion, it was fair and reasonable to litigate as far as the Court of Appeal, I come to the conclusion that the costs here have been reasonably incurred in connection with an application to the court which was requisite. In my opinion, the Coal Board ought to pay all the costs of this appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree.

[There followed discussion as to the scale of costs to be ordered.]

LORD GREENE, M.R. : We all take the view that the costs reasonably incurred within the meaning of the paragraph are the costs of all parties as between party and party. The trustees can take the difference between that and solicitor and client costs out of the estate.

Appeal dismissed ; party and party costs of all parties to be paid by the National Coal Board.

Solicitors : Ashurst, Morris Crisp & Co. (for the plaintiff); Pennington & Son (for the trustees and remaindermen) ; Solicitor, National Coal Board.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Somervell and Cohen, L.JJ.), April 29, May 23, 1949.]

Conflict of Laws—Jurisdiction of court—Nullity—Non-consummation—Wilful refusal—Respondent domiciled and resident in Canada—Marriage in England.

Nullity—Jurisdiction—Domicil -Marriage in England—Petitioner domiciled and resident in England at time of marriage and resident in England when petition presented—Husband domiciled and resident in Canada.

In 1943 the parties were married in England, the wife then being domiciled and resident in England. The husband was a member of the Canadian forces and his domicil and residence were Canadian. The only periods spent by the parties together in England were the night of the marriage, seven days a few weeks later, and two hours in April, 1945. In June, 1945, the husband returned to Canada, and in May, 1946, the wife joined him, but he told her that he was no longer in love with her and after some two and a half months the wife returned to England. The marriage was never consummated owing to the husband's wilful refusal. In a suit brought by the wife for a decree of nullity on the ground that the marriage had not been consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the husband to consummate it, the husband did not enter an appearance nor take any part in the proceedings. No evidence was given whether, by Canadian law, the marriage was void or voidable on the ground of wilful refusal. The question was whether an English court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

Held : (i) although certain Canadian cases indicated that a marriage annulled on the ground of impotence was, according to Canadian law, void ab initio, there was no evidence to show that Canadian law would regard those cases as applying today to a case of nullity on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate, and, accordingly, in the absence of evidence, the court was bound to regard Canadian law as being the same as English law, with the result that the marriage in the present case was voidable only and not void, and the wife's domicil followed that of the husband until the marriage was annulled.

(ii) the marriage being voidable and the husband being domiciled abroad, the fact that the marriage was celebrated in England was not sufficient to found jurisdiction in the suit.

the wife for a decree of nullity on the ground of the husband's wilful refusal to consummate the marriage, the commissioner holding that he had no jurisdiction owing to the Canadian domicil of the husband. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Bucknill, L.J.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from the judgment of His Honour Judge Earengey sitting as a commissioner in divorce whereby he dismissed the petition of the wife for a decree of nullity on the ground that her marriage had not been consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the husband. The petition, dated Feb. 6, 1948, was served on the husband in Canada. He did not enter an appearance and has not taken any part in the proceedings. The petition admitted that at the time when it was filed both wife and husband were domiciled in Canada.

The wife, at the time of her marriage in England on Feb. 27, 1943, was domiciled and resident in England. The husband was a member of the Canadian forces and his domicil and residence were Canadian. The parties slept together on the night of the marriage, but the husband made no effort to consummate the marriage. He rejoined his unit on the following day, but he obtained seven days' leave a few weeks later which he spent with the wife, but again he made no attempt to consummate the marriage. Apart from two hours together in April, 1945, the wife did not see the husband again before his return to Canada in June, 1945. In May, 1946, the wife went to Canada and rejoined the husband, but she found his manner cool and reserved, and shortly afterwards he admitted that he was no longer in love with her and said that in those circumstances it would be wrong for intercourse to take place. After two and a half months together, and after he had said that he had ceased to love her and that this was final, the wife, without any dissent on his part, returned to England and subsequently filed this petition.

On these facts the judge found that the husband had wilfully refused to consummate the marriage, but dismissed the petition because he held that the court had no jurisdiction to grant a decree of nullity. The ground of his decision was that the case was governed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in De Reneville v. De Reneville (1). In that case an Englishwoman, domiciled and resident in England, was married in Paris to a Frenchman domiciled and resident in France and thereafter lived with him in France. She subsequently returned to England and petitioned for a decree of nullity on the ground of impotence or wilful refusal to consummate the marriage. The Court of Appeal held that: (i) By English law a marriage is voidable and not void on the ground of impotence or wilful refusal to consummate it. If voidable, the marriage must be regarded as having had the effect of giving to the petitioner, as a matter of law, the French domicil of her husband and as precluding her from casting off that domicil before a decree of annulment is actually pronounced. (ii) The question whether the marriage was void or merely voidable was for French law to answer. Lord Greene, M.R., said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 61):

> "The validity of a marriage so far as regards the observance of formalities is a matter for the lex loci celebrationis. But this is not a case of forms. It is a case of essential validity. By what law is that to be decided? In my opinion, by the law of France, either because that is the law of the husband's domicil at the date of the marriage or (preferably, in my view) because at that date it was the law of the matrimonial domicil in reference to which the parties may have been supposed to enter into the bonds of marriage."

(iii) The English court had no jurisdiction to grant a decree of nullity on the ground of impotence or wilful refusal solely on the ground of the wife's residence in England before and at the time of the institution of the suit.

The only material difference between the facts in that case and the present one is that in De Reneville's case (1) the celebration of marriage took place in Paris. Counsel for the wife argued that the fact that the marriage was in England gives the court jurisdiction in the present case. He relied in support of his argument on reported cases where the court decided on the validity of a marriage celebrated in this country although the respondent husband was resident and domiciled abroad when the suit was instituted. Thus, in Simonin v. Mallac (2) the material facts were that a man and woman, both domiciled and resident in France, came over to England for the purpose of being married here. They went through a regular form of marriage in church on June 21, 1854, and two days later returned to Paris. The marriage contravened the law of France regulating the marriage of native-domiciled French subjects contracted in foreign countries. The husband refused to consummate the marriage, and on Dec. 1, 1854, on the petition of the wife the appropriate court in France declared the marriage null and of no legal effect. About four years later, the "wife," who was then residing and domiciled in England, applied to the Divorce Court for a decree of nullity of her marriage. The court dismissed the petition on the ground that the validity of the contract of marriage depended on the law of England as prevailing among English subjects. The decision in this case merely dealt with the question whether the court had jurisdiction to decide on the validity of a contract of marriage made in England. As LORD HALDANE said in Salvesen (or von Lorang) v. Austrian Property Administrator (3) ([1927] A.C. 659), with reference to Simonin v. Mallac (2) :

> "SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL held that as the marriage had been solemnised in England, the parties had contracted with reference to the law of this country as to validity."

In the present case no question arises as to the validity of the contract of marriage so far as forms are concerned. The only question is whether the court has jurisdiction to annul this marriage which, by English law, is not void ab initio, but voidable, and, therefore, valid until the decree avoiding it is declared.

In Sottomayer v. De Barros (4) the petitioner and respondent were first cousins * and Portuguese subjects domiciled in Portugal. They came to reside in England in 1858, and in 1866 went through a regular form of marriage in London. They returned to Portugal in 1873. Their domicil throughout was Portuguese. By the law of Portugal a marriage between first cousins was incestuous and illegal. In 1874 the petitioner filed a petition praying the court to declare the marriage to be null and void. SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE, who heard the case, dismissed the petition because he felt himself bound by the decision in Simonin v. Mallac (2). The Court of Appeal reversed this decision and, in the course of his judgment, COTTON, L.J., who gave the judgment of the court, said (3 P.D. 5) :

> "The law of a country where a marriage is solemnised must alone decide all questions relating to the validity of the ceremony by which the marriage is alleged to have been constituted ; but, as in other contracts, so in that of marriage, personal capacity must depend on the law of domicil."

At the conclusion of the judgment COTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 7) :

> "It only remains to consider the case of Simonin v. Mallac (2). The objection to the validity of the marriage in that case, which was solemnised in England, was the want of the consent of parents required by the law of France, but not under the circumstances by that of this country.

* After the decree nisi – and before it was made absolute – the Queen's Proctor intervened to shew cause. Consequently the decision was reversed. See Sottomayer v. De Barros (1879) 5 P. D. 44.

> In our opinion, this consent must be considered a part of the ceremony of marriage, and not a matter affecting the personal capacity of the parties to contract marriage ; and the decision in Simonin v. Mallac (2) does not, we think, govern the present case."

I understand that the court was prepared to annul the marriage in Sottomayer v. De Barros (4), not because the marriage was celebrated in England, but because the domicil and residence of both parties was in Portugal. Cotton, L.J., said (ibid., 6) :

> "It is proved that the courts of Portugal, where the petitioner and respondent are domiciled and resident, would hold the marriage void, as solemnised between parties incapable of marrying, and incestuous. How can the courts of this country hold the contrary, and, if appealed to, say the marriage is valid ?"

The essential difference, however, between Sottomayer v. De Barros (4) and the present case is that the marriage in the present case was valid in all respects so far as form and capacity were concerned. It is merely voidable because of the wilful refusal of the husband to consummate it.

Two other cases to which counsel referred were Galene v. Galene (otherwise Galice) (5) and De Massa (otherwise Horveno) v. De Massa (6). In Galene's case (5) Henn Collins, J., followed the decision of Lord Merrivale, P., in De Massa (otherwise Horveno) v. De Massa (6) in 1931. The facts in that case were that the petitioner, a Frenchwoman and a minor, went through a form of marriage in London in July, 1927, with a Frenchman. They subsequently lived together in London for three weeks and the petitioner then returned to France and had not seen the respondent since. Three years later a decree of the French court was obtained annulling the English marriage on the ground that the petitioner's father had not given his consent to the marriage as required by French law. When the wife subsequently petitioned for a decree of nullity in the Divorce Court, Lord Merrivale, P., pointed out that the domicil was French and that it was necessarily a matter for a French tribunal. He then said ([1939] 2 All E.R. 150) :

> "A French tribunal of competent jurisdiction has annulled the marriage, and that declaration of nullity has come into operation. All that it is necessary for me to do now, the facts being in due order, is to declare the marriage to have been null and void, citing the judgment of the French tribunal as a judgment between the parties."

Some support for the wife's argument in the present case may be found in the judgment of Sir Gorell Barnes, P., in Ogden v. Ogden (7), where he said ([1908] P. 80) :

> ". . . it has frequently been held that, although the courts of the domicil of the parties might entertain the question of the validity of their marriage, yet that the courts of the country in which the marriage was celebrated will also entertain a suit to determine the same question : see Linke (otherwise Van Aerde) v. Van Aerde (8). It may possibly be that if a suit were brought for nullity on the ground of impotence, and the facts were established in favour of the petitioner, either in the court of the domicil of the parties or in the court of the country in which the marriage was celebrated, it might be reasonable to hold that such a decree ought to be treated as universally binding . . ."

In Linke (otherwise Van Aerde) v. Van Aerde (8) the wife petitioned for a decree of nullity of her marriage on the ground that the respondent was then a married man. Both husband and wife were foreign, but the marriage was celebrated in England. Gorell Barnes, J., in his judgment, said (10 T.L.R. 426) ;

> "The marriage contract was entered into here, that the principles of dissolution of marriage did not apply to nullity suits, and that in these suits the validity of the ceremony was to be determined according to the law of the place in which it was celebrated. The jurisdiction of this court to deal with the question of the validity of the marriage of the parties to the present suit was therefore clear."

The law, however, draws a distinction between nullity cases based on bigamy and nullity cases based on impotence or wilful refusal to consummate, as the decision in De Reneville v. De Reneville (1) pointed out. The suggestion of Sir Gorell Barnes, P., in Ogden v. Ogden (7) was not accepted by Bateson, J., in Inverclyde (otherwise Tripp) v. Inverclyde (9). In that case Bateson, J., held that the court had no jurisdiction to grant a decree of nullity on the ground of impotence in a case where the marriage took place in London, but both husband and wife were domiciled in Scotland. I find, therefore, no clear decision on the point as to the jurisdiction in nullity cases on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate it where the marriage has been celebrated in England, but the respondent husband is domiciled and resident abroad.

It is well established that in a case where the petition is for the dissolution of a marriage the court has no jurisdiction to grant a decree on the ground that the marriage took place in England if the domicil of the husband, and therefore, of the wife, is abroad at the time of the institution of the suit. Such jurisdiction is based exclusively on domicil as decided by the Privy Council in Le Mesurier v, Le Mesurier (10), and approved by the House of Lords in Salvesen's case (3). Why, then, should there be a distinction, on the ground of the place of celebration of marriage, between a petition for dissolution of a valid marriage and a petition to annul a marriage on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate it ? I can see no valid reason for such a distinction. It is not necessary in this case to decide whether there is a difference between the jurisdiction to dissolve and the jurisdiction to annul in that the residence of both parties in England at the time of the institution of the nullity suit may be sufficient to establish jurisdiction, although such residence is insufficient in the case of a valid marriage which is not voidable but dissoluble. That question is undecided, but I see no sufficient reason why the law should declare that the celebration of marriage in England may in itself found jurisdiction in a suit based on wilful refusal to consummate, although it does not do so in a suit for dissolution of marriage. There may be considerable hardship to the petitioner in refusing jurisdiction where both parties are resident within the jurisdiction although domiciled abroad at the time when the suit is instituted, but there is not the same hardship to the petitioner in refusing jurisdiction in a case where the ceremony of marriage took place in England but the respondent is resident and domiciled abroad. In the present case it may be hard on the wife to require her to take proceedings in Canada to obtain a decree of nullity. It is also hard on the husband to require him to defend the suit in England. I think that inasmuch as the wife could have started proceedings in Canada for a decree of nullity when she was there, but elected to leave Canada and return to England, the scales of hardship tip in favour of the husband rather than the wife, so far as the venue is concerned. I may here quote the words of Lord Greene, M.R., in De Reneville's case (1) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 63) :

> "That a wife who is resident but, ex hypothesi, not domiciled here can compel her husband who is both domiciled and resident abroad to come to this country . . . appears to me to be contrary both to principle and to convenience."

A further point arises, viz. : Should the question whether this marriage is void or voidable be decided by English law or Canadian law ? The passage in Lord Greene's judgment in De Reneville's case (1), which I have already cited, indicates that the law applicable is the law of Canada, because the husband is domiciled in Canada, and because at the date of the marriage it was the matrimonial domicil in reference to which the parties may have been supposed to enter into the bonds of marriage. I do not think that the fact that the marriage took place in England while the husband was on active service raises an inference that the parties intended to make England their permanent matrimonial domicil. Apart from evidence to the contrary, one assumes that the law of Canada on the question of voidability of marriages is the same as English law, as stated in De Reneville's case (1). No evidence as to the appropriate Canadian law on the subject was produced before the trial judge or before the Court of Appeal. The note in Professor Cheshire's work on Private International Law, 3rd ed., p. 449, refers to two cases in Canada in which the court held that it had jurisdiction to annul a marriage by reason of the impotence of a respondent, resident and domiciled abroad, provided the marriage was celebrated within the jurisdiction. The first is G. v. G. (11), decided by the Court of King's Bench for the province of Saskatchewan in 1928. MacDonald, J., held that the court had jurisdiction to grant a decree of nullity of marriage entered into in Saskatchewan on the ground of the impotence of the wife although the husband plaintiff was domiciled and resident in Alberta and the wife was residing in Manitoba at the time of the commencement of the action. The learned judge founded his judgment, inter alia, on the decisions in the following cases :—Brook v. Brook (12), Ogden v. Ogden (7), Linke v. Van Aerde (8), and Sotomayer v. De Barros (4). The other case is Reid v. Francis (13) decided by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in 1929. In that case the marriage took place in the city of Saskatoon, and the parties lived there four years after the marriage. The defendant husband then left the province and went to live in California, where he was served with the writ of summons. The judgment of Martin, J.A., who delivered the judgment of the court, dealt with the question of jurisdiction as follows (1929) (4 D.L.R. 312) :

> "I do not consider it necessary to determine whether or not the defendant husband was domiciled in Saskatchewan at the time of the issue of the writ (although I am of the opinion that so far as appears in the evidence, he was), because the Court of King's Bench has jurisdiction to entertain a suit for a declaration of nullity of an existing marriage when the marriage was celebrated in Saskatchewan."

In addition to some of the cases referred to in the previous report of G. v. G. (11), Simonin v. Mallac (2), Niboyet v. Niboyet (14) and Mitford v. Mitford (15), were referred to.

Both these Canadian cases were decided before the English decisions in Inverclyde (9) (1931) and De Reneville (1) (1948). The cases cited in the Canadian judgments tend to show, in my respectful opinion, that the Canadian courts at that time regarded a nullity suit on the ground of impotence as one in which the marriage was void ab initio. It may be argued that these cases show that by Canadian law, at any rate, in 1929, a marriage was void and not merely voidable on the ground of impotence, and, therefore, that the wife in this case had not by Canadian law acquired her husband's domicil, and, therefore, that she, being domiciled and resident in England, was entitled to ask for a declaration of nullity in the English Divorce Court : see White v. White (16), approved in De Reneville's case (1). I am not satisfied from these decisions, however, that the Canadian law, in 1948, so far as nullity proceedings for wilful refusal to consummate are concerned, would not be the same as the decision of the Court of Appeal in De Reneville's case (1). This point as to Canadian law was not argued before us.

My opinion in favour of dismissing this appeal is based partly on the balance of hardship to the parties, but mainly on the analogy of the rule that the court of the domicil of the husband is the sole court in dissolving a valid marriage. It seems to me reasonable that a similar rule should be applied in principle to a marriage which is merely voidable on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate it. There may be an exception to the rule in the case of a
A voidable marriage where both parties are resident in the country where the petition is filed, but I do not see the necessity of making an exception on the ground that the marriage has been celebrated in the country where jurisdiction is invoked. I am in favour of dismissing the appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J. (read by COHEN, L.J.). In Inverclyde v. Inverclyde (9), BATESON, J., based his decision on the principle that suits for nullity
B in which the marriage is voidable, being similar to suits for dissolution, the only court that has jurisdiction is that of the domicil. It is clear from the judgment in De Reneville v. De Reneville (1) that this court did not accept that principle. If that had been the basis, the cases in which jurisdiction had been exercised where both parties were resident, though not domiciled, were plainly wrong. LORD GREENE, M.R., however, expressly refrained from coming to C any conclusion on that point ([1948] 1 All E.R. 63).

We were referred to a number of cases in which the suit for nullity was based on the alleged invalidity of the ceremony. Jurisdiction has in such cases been exercised although the parties were not domiciled here, but the ceremony was performed here: see Cooper v. Crane (17), Hussein (otherwise Blitz) v. Hussein (18). In the present case, however, it is not suggested that the D ceremony was invalid. It is clear from Salvesen v. Austrian Property Administrator (3), that the courts of the country in which the parties are domiciled have jurisdiction to annul a marriage on the ground that the ceremony of marriage was invalid though performed in another country. LORD PHILLIMORE expressed the opinion ([1927] A.C. 671) that the courts of the country of domicil had exclusive jurisdiction. This was obiter and has not
E been followed in, for example, Hussein's case (18). In Simonin v. Mallac (2) the parties, being domiciled in France, went through a ceremony of marriage in England, returning thereafter to France. The man obtained a decree of nullity in France owing to the non-observance of conditions precedent required by French law. The woman subsequently came to reside here and petitioned for a decree of nullity. Her petition was refused. It seems clear that today
F the court would, in the absence of fraud or collusion which was not suggested, have accepted the decree of the French court as settling the status of the parties. This does not mean that the court would not have had jurisdiction to entertain the petition. In De Massa (otherwise Horveno) v. De Massa (6), followed in Galene v. Galene (5), a decree was pronounced here, the ceremony having been performed here, following on and by way of enforcing decrees
G previously pronounced by the courts of the domicil. In both these cases the petitions were based on the invalidity of the ceremony.

In my opinion, these cases do not cover the present issue. It may well be convenient that the courts of the country where a ceremony of marriage has been performed should have jurisdiction to entertain suits where the validity of that ceremony is in issue. Where, however, the ceremony is not attacked,
H a different issue arises and there seems to me no ground in principle for giving jurisdiction to the courts of the country of the ceremony. The present case illustrates the inconvenience. The husband whose status is affected is domiciled and resident in Canada and the events mainly relied on in support of the petition took place in Canada. De Reneville v. De Reneville (1) decided that in the case of a voidable marriage the fact that the petitioner was, previous to the marriage, domiciled here is not a ground on which jurisdiction can be founded. The mere fact that the ceremony of marriage took place in a certain country does not seem to me a ground for founding jurisdiction in that country in cases where the matters alleged in the petition do not in any way dispute the validity of the ceremony as affecting a marriage. With regard to Inverclyde v. Inverclyde (9), Pilcher, J., in Hutter v. Hutter (19), refused to follow that case where both parties were resident in England at the time of the institution of the suit. That point does not arise here. No doubt there is force in the argument that nullity suits where the marriage is voidable are similar to suits for dissolution. On the other hand, there seems to me considerable reasons of convenience for giving the courts where the respondent or both parties reside jurisdiction in this class of case, and I would desire, so far as this court is concerned, to keep that point open until it arises.

COHEN, L.J. : I have written a judgment in this case, but I have since had an opportunity of reading the judgment which has been delivered by Bucknill, L.J., and I find myself in such complete agreement with it that I will not take up time by giving reasons of my own for agreeing that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

LAZARUS-BARLOW v. REGENT ESTATES CO., LTD., AND ANOTHER.

[Court of Appeal (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ.), May 10, 11, 30, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Previous tenancy held to be outside Rent Acts —Whether decision binding on subsequent tenant—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 11 (1).

The Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 10 (1), provides : "For the purposes of proviso (i) to sub-s. (2) of s. 12 of the [Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] (which relates to the exclusion of dwelling-houses from the [Act of 1920] in certain circumstances), a dwelling-house shall not be deemed to be bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture unless the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to the attendance or the use of the furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, forms a substantial portion of the whole rent. Section 11 (1) provides : "The county court shall have power on the application of a landlord or a tenant to determine summarily any questions as to the amount of the . . . standard rent . . . of any dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies . . ."

On Sept. 1, 1939, a flat was let by the first defendants to one K. for three years at a rent of £165 a year. In 1944 the first defendants brought proceedings in the High Court against K. for ejectment, and the court made an order for possession, holding that the value of the services rendered under the lease formed a substantial portion of K.'s rent, and, therefore, that K. was not protected by the Rent Acts. By a lease dated May 11, 1945, the first defendants let the flat to the plaintiff for a term of seven years at a rent of £280 a year. By its terms the first defendants covenanted to provide the same services to the plaintiff as had been rendered to K., but it was now conceded that in view of the decision in Palser v. Grinling ([1948] 1 All E.R. 1) the value of the services no longer formed a substantial portion of the rent, and, therefore, the premises were not excluded from the protection of the Rent Acts. On June 30, 1948, the reversion expectant on the plaintiff's lease was acquired by the second defendants. On an application by the plaintiff for a determination of the standard rent of the flat it was contended that the decision in K.'s case was one to which the plaintiff was not a party, and, therefore, it was not binding on her; that the decision in K.'s case was wrong; and that the standard rent should be based on the rent at which the flat was first let within the meaning of the Rent Acts, viz., £165 and not £280.

HELD: (i) the fact that the Rent Acts might operate in rem did not mean that judgments under the Acts were conclusive against all persons.

(ii) the decision as to K.'s tenancy was res inter alios acta and binding only on the parties to those proceedings and their privies, and the present case should, therefore, be remitted to the county court to re-determine whether K.'s tenancy was or was not within the Rent Acts and to fix the standard rent accordingly.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE BENSLEY WELLS, sitting at Marylebone County Court, dated Jan. 21, 1949, determining the standard rent of a flat at £280 a year and disregarding a previous letting at a rent of £165 a year, on the ground that in 1944 the High Court had decided that the first letting was outside the Rent Acts and that that decision was binding on the plaintiff, although not a party to the action. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the county court to determine the standard rent on the footing that the previous judgment must be disregarded as res inter alios acta. The facts appear in the judgment of EVERSHED, L.J.

Beney, K.C., and Crispin for the plaintiff.
Lloyd-Jones, K.C., and Willett for the first defendants.
Marshall, K.C., I. H. Jacob and Alfred Stone for the second defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30. LORD GREENE, M.R.: I have read the judgment about to be read by EVERSHED, L.J. I agree with it and only propose to add a word or two of my own. In the course of the argument I was impressed by the suggestion that the legislature might have been expected to provide for the finality of judgments of the county court determining whether a given dwelling-house was one to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied or what its standard rent should be. It would, no doubt, have been convenient, though the practical inconvenience must not be exaggerated, if a judgment in such a matter, given between competent parties, could have been made binding on the whole world. At one time I was attracted by the argument that the use in certain authorities of such expressions as that the Acts "operate in rem" required or justified such an interpretation. On consideration I have come to the conclusion that when the history of these observations is examined they cannot be interpreted to mean that judgments under the Acts operate in rem, a quite different conception. If the legislature had intended so radical a departure from the ordinary rule that a judgment inter partes which does not fall under one of the known heads of judgments in rem is, so far as third persons, not privies, are concerned, res inter alios acta, it would have said so. In the present case, moreover, the language of s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, seems to make it clear that any tenant can apply to the county court for a determination of the amount of the standard rent, a provision which, in my view, is inconsistent with the idea that an applicant would be conclusively bound by a previous decision to which he was no party. There are other difficulties which are referred to by EVERSHED, L.J. The order will be as EVERSHED, L.J., will state.

EVERSHED, L.J. : The judgment I am about to read is the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., and myself. These are proceedings by the plaintiff, Miss Lazarus-Barlow, under s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, to have determined the standard rent of a flat, No. 28, Manor House, Marylebone, of which she is the tenant. Her present landlords are the second defendants who acquired from the first defendants on June 30, 1948, the reversion expectant on the plaintiff's lease. The lease, dated May 11, 1945, was for a term of seven years from Mar. 25, 1945, and the contractual rent was £280 per annum. By its terms the first defendants, in effect, covenanted to provide certain services by way of delivery of coals, removal of refuse, etc. It is unnecessary to refer further to the terms of the lease, for it has been conceded for the purposes of this appeal that the value to the plaintiff at the date of the granting of the lease of these services was, as fixed by the county court judge, not more than £26 per annum, a figure rather less than ten per cent. of the amount of the rent. Since the rateable value of the flat is and was at all material times within the limit set by the Rent Acts, the flat is and was prima facie within the ambit of those Acts, and it is also conceded that the proportion which the value of the services previously mentioned bears to the total rent of £280 is not such as to exclude the premises from the Acts. On Sept. 1, 1939, the flat was in the occupation of one Kerner as tenant of the first defendants. Kerner's lease was, for practical purposes, identical with the plaintiff's lease, save that the term was three years and that the rent fixed thereby was £165 per annum instead of £280 per annum, and it is the plaintiff's case in these proceedings that that rent (£165 per annum) constitutes the standard rent of the premises.

In 1944 the first defendants brought proceedings in the High Court for ejectment against Kerner [Regent Estates Co., Ltd. v. Kerner (1)], and on Dec. 5 of that year they obtained from LORD CALDECOTE, C.J., an order for possession. From the judgment of the learned Chief Justice it is plain that Kerner sought to rely, by way of defence to the claim made against him, on the Rent Acts, and that the first defendants' answer to that defence was that the value of the services rendered by the defendants under the lease to Kerner (which were the same as those which the second defendants are now liable to render to the plaintiff) formed a substantial portion of Kerner's rent : see s. 3 (2) (b) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939; and s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1923, as amended by sched. I to the Act of 1939. This question was decided by the learned Lord Chief Justice in favour of the first defendants, the material part of his judgment being in the following terms :

> "There are 52 flats and to perform those services, which is admitted to be attendance within the meaning of the Act, it seems to me that a substantial cost was involved. Perhaps I ought not to use the words 'substantial cost' because on this I had not intended to express a view, but if everybody was to have coal brought up and the dust and refuse removed before 9 a.m., I think there must have been a considerable payment expended in employing persons who would carry out those duties. I have to consider whether that considerable expenditure is a substantial part of the rent. I can only interpret 'substantial part of the rent' as A meaning a real part of the rent and not a mere trifle. 'Substantial' cannot mean half or a quarter or a third or anything of that sort; it means something which can be recognised and ascertained and quantified. I have been given a figure in evidence as to the cost of the services which were rendered, some of which were clearly, as Mr. Green admitted to me, not to be taken into account as attendance provided in consideration of B rent, but although I do not think that anything like £2,000 should be regarded as paid for providing attendance, I am satisfied that these services must have required the employment of men who would be paid £2, £3 or £4 a week, and a proportion of those payments would, of course, be expended in respect of each of those 52 flats."

If this decision was correct, it follows that the lease to Kerner was not a C letting to which the Rent Acts applied, with the result that the flat was not "let" on Sept. 1, 1939, within the meaning of the Rent Acts, for it must be taken that by the word "let" is meant "let pursuant to a letting to which the Acts apply: see Signy v. Abbey National Building Society (2). It follows, accordingly, since there was no "letting" before Sept. 1, 1939, that the standard rent of the premises has to be determined by reference to the "letting" D since that date, namely, the letting to the plaintiff. In other words, the standard rent on this view will be £280 per annum, and this is the defendants' answer to the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff, however, by way of premise to her case, says that LORD CALDECOTE's decision, having been made in proceedings to which she was not a party, is not binding on her. She claims further that the decision was wrong, being inconsistent with the recent decision of the E House of Lords in Palser v. Grinling (3), and that she is entitled in the present proceedings to litigate afresh in the county court the question whether the lease to Kerner was or was not within the ambit of the Rent Acts and to have that question determined in her favour on the ground that in the light of the House of Lords' decision in Palser v. Grinling (3) the value to Kerner of the services to which he was entitled was not a substantial portion of the rent of F £165. As later appears, the last point is one which, if the premise of the plaintiff's argument is well founded, would have to be remitted to the county court for determination, but if the plaintiff is justified in all her contentions it follows that the standard rent of the premises is £165 per annum instead of £280 per annum, and it follows, consequently, that she would be entitled to have the order against her on the second defendants' counterclaim for G £110 13*s*. 4*d*. set aside and to obtain judgment in respect of overpaid rent against the first and second defendants respectively, for £70 6*s*. 0*d*. and £94 14*s*. 0*d*.

As we have already indicated, the real question which is presented for the determination of this court is that involved in the premise to the plaintiff's argument, namely, whether it is now open to the plaintiff to raise in these H proceedings the character of Kerner's lease or whether, as the defendants say, that matter has been irrevocably determined by the judgment of LORD CALDECOTE, a judgment which was admittedly given by a court of competent jurisdiction in an action bona fide litigated between the then landlord and the then tenant, which was not appealed from, and which is not now capable of being appealed from by the tenant or by the present plaintiff who was not a party to the proceedings. The point is a short one, but by no means easy, and, though many cases have been cited to us in argument, no authority has been found which bears directly on it. In his short judgment the county court judge expressed the view that the plaintiff was not precluded from arguing that her own tenancy was a protected tenancy by reason merely of the Kerner judgment (1), that is, that it was open to her to argue that the value of the services rendered to her under the lease of 1945 was not a substantial portion of her rent notwithstanding the decision of Lord Caldecote that the value of the identical services rendered to Kerner constituted a substantial portion of his rent of £165 a year. On this point we think the county court judge was clearly right. He proceeded, however, as follows :

> " It is common ground between the parties that on the assumption that the [plaintiff's] tenancy is a protected tenancy . . . the standard rent is the rent at which the property was first let after Sept. 1, 1939 [if] of course, it was not let on that date. It was let on Sept. 1, but the letting . . . was the Kerner letting, and there is ample authority for the proposition that in arriving at the standard rent I must disregard any rent which was in respect of a letting outside the Act. The learned Chief Justice held that the Kerner letting was outside the Act. Therefore, the Kerner rent was one which I am bound to disregard."

It is round the last sentence, " Therefore, the Kerner rent was one which I am bound to disregard," that the whole argument has ranged, for no criticism has been made, or can be made, of the preceding language.

It is clear that the Kerner judgment (1) cannot operate to estop the plaintiff per rem judicatam, but learned counsel for the defendant companies have contended that, having regard to the policy and general tenor of the Rent Acts, the judgment had the effect of determining at its date the " status " of the flat as outside the scope of the Acts, and, at any rate to that extent, had the quality of a judgment "in rem" binding accordingly on all the world, or at least on the plaintiff. The Rent Restriction legislation has, since it was first introduced, given rise to a rich volume of judicial decisions, and judges have from time to time observed it to be a characteristic of the legislation that it operates "in rem and not in personam." Counsel not unnaturally referred to a number of instances, but they then proceeded to argue that from these authorities it followed, or should follow, that judgments determining the " status " of specific premises, i.e., that they were or were not at a particular date a dwelling-house within the Acts, should be treated as judgments "in rem" so as to be binding on all the world or on all persons subsequently interested in the premises, and not only on parties to the decision or their privies.

In our judgment, this argument cannot be accepted. It is not, we find, necessary for the purposes of the present case to attempt to define what is the precise significance of the phrase that has been used, " the Acts operate in rem," save to observe that it appears to be used in a somewhat special sense. The term " judgment in rem " is one clearly understood to the law and has been defined in Halsbury's Laws of England, Hailsham ed., vol. 13, p. 405, para. 460, as meaning

> " . . . the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction determining the status of a person or thing, or the disposition of a thing (as distinct from the particular interest in it of a party to the litigation)."

Such a judgment is conclusive evidence for and against all persons whether parties, privies or strangers of the matters actually decided : see Phipson on Evidence, 8th ed., p. 401. The words " the Acts apply in rem " have been used, by way perhaps of analogy, to illustrate the point that, given certain facts, the Acts will or may operate not merely in relation to a particular tenancy of some premises and between the parties to that tenancy, but in relation to the premises as such, for example, " by attaching to a dwelling-house a standard rent which applies to the whole house, and, where necessary, also applies by apportionment to every part" : per GREER, L.J., in Lloyd v. Cook (4) ([1929] 1 K.B. 135) ; and see also the earlier case of King v. York (5) where a Divisional Court held that it was the house itself and not a particular tenant that was protected. Though we have examined carefully all the cases cited to us in argument it is clear that in none of them was the point raised, still less decided, that a determination of the facts essential to and involving the applicability of the Acts to any premises pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction operated as conclusive evidence for or against persons not parties or privies to the judgment.

The question, however, in the present case is not whether the Acts operate in rem, but whether determinations by the courts of matters of fact or of mixed law and fact essential to the application, or non-application, of the Acts to particular premises on particular dates operate "in rem" in the sense of binding not only parties to the proceedings and their privies, but all other persons who may thereafter be interested in the premises. It is clear that, if judgments of the kind stated have so extensive an effect, the result involves a substantial departure from the ordinary rule. Counsel for the plaintiff was, at least, entitled to say that, in the absence of direct authority, the burden was on his opponents to point to the provisions of the Acts which expressly or by necessary implication lead to so far-reaching a result. We have not seen the order in fact made by the Lord Chief Justice. We assume it to have been an order in common form against Kerner commanding him within a limited time to deliver up possession of the premises in suit to the first defendants. Such an order would not, on the face of it, appear to have any of the qualities of a judgment "in rem." It is, however, said that when regard is had to the reasons given by the Lord Chief Justice for his judgment, it is clear that the order made necessarily involved a determination of the question that at its date the letting to Kerner was not a controlled letting. That is true. The defendants' argument, however, involves, in the first place, the application to judgments in suits relating to premises which at some date (past or future) fall within the embrace of the Rent Acts considerations properly relevant to estoppel by record, that is, that such judgments will have the binding effect claimed as regards any matters relevant to the application of the Acts which were, in fact, raised and determined in the action and also presumably which could and should have been so raised. There is also, in our judgment, considerable difficulty in the way of accurate formulation of the extent and limits of the principle sought to be established. It was conceded by counsel for the second defendants that the judgment relied on would have to be free of any taint of fraud or collusion and to have been pronounced in an action "duly litigated." Where, as in the present case, the qualities of a particular tenancy have been judicially determined in an action between the actual parties to the contract, there is obvious force in the argument that such a decision ought, at least, to carry more weight than a determination of the same question between persons who were not parties to the bargain, and the more so where one of the matters in issue is the value to the tenant at the date of the contract of board, attendance or the use of furniture.

If, however, the principle for which the defendant companies contend be admitted, where and how is the line to be drawn ? If there had been no Kerner judgment (1) in the present case, would a determination of the character of the Kerner letting and, consequently, of the standard rent made in the present proceedings between the plaintiff and the defendants bind future tenants not deriving title from the plaintiff ? What of a judgment capable of being shown to be based on some manifest error of fact, for example, an erroneous entry in the rate books of a rateable value ? Would a judicial determination that certain premises were not within the Acts made in proceedings between a vendor and purchaser bind future tenants ? Would a judicial determination between a landlord and occupier that the latter was not a tenant but a licensee bind a rating authority? If an affirmative answer is given to the above questions it is obvious that the principle sought to be established is of a very far-reaching character, and the difficulties are formidable of finding in the Acts any language to justify either so extensive a departure from the general rule or, on the other hand, a principle requiring so elaborate a formulation.

In our judgment, it is impossible to find any sufficient justification in the Acts for either of these last mentioned alternatives. As we have already indicated, the proposition that the Acts apply in rem does not involve the further proposition that judgment establishing the conditions for the application, or non-application, of the Acts likewise operate in rem, nor do we think that any sufficient support can be derived from considering the general "policy" of the Acts. So far, indeed, as policy is concerned, the effect in the present case seems rather to be the other way. du Parcq, L.J., in Griffiths v. Davies (6) said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 213):

> "The whole scheme of the Act is to prevent a tenant from coming to any agreement or doing anything which shall increase the standard rent . . ."

In that case the tenant had failed in earlier proceedings to take certain points which would have had the effect of reducing the amount recoverable from him by way of arrears of rent, and it was held by this court that it would be contrary to the policy of the Acts and the duty imposed thereby on the courts to treat such failure as operating to estop the same tenant from subsequently applying under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 to have the standard rent truly determined. In the present case, if the argument of the defendant companies prevails, the Kerner judgment (1), though wrongly decided (if it was wrongly decided), will for all time prevent any tenant from having the standard rent properly determined. Moreover, the terms of s. 11 (1) itself, under which the present application has been made, seem to us against the contention of the defendant companies. The sub-section, so far as relevant, is as follows:

> "The county court shall have power on the application of a landlord or a tenant to determine summarily any question as to the amount of the . . . standard rent . . . of any dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies . . ."

The terms of the sub-section are perfectly general, and would, in our view, be inapposite if a determination of the standard rent of a dwelling-house once made between a particular landlord and a particular tenant were intended to be conclusive for all time.

Reference may also be made to s. 6 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, which provides that, in proceedings for fixing the standard rent of any premises to which the Act applies, if no evidence is available in regard to the rent of those premises at the material date, the court may, for the purposes of those proceedings determine their standard rent by reference to the standard rent of similar premises. The section concludes:

> " . . . as from the date on which any such determination is made under this section the standard rent of the dwelling-house shall, unless the court making the determination otherwise orders, be deemed for all purposes to be of that amount."

The question is not before us whether the words in the section "for all purposes" are intended (in contradistinction to the earlier words in the section "for the purpose of those proceedings") to have the effect that a determination under the section binds persons not parties or privies to the proceedings in which the determination is made, or whether they mean no more than that the figure arrived at shall, as between the persons bound by the decision according to the ordinary rule of law, be treated as the standard rent for all purposes of the Acts—for example, for the purpose of determining the amount of any permitted increase in the rent or the amount of rent that is legally recoverable. Without, therefore, expressing any opinion on the proper construction of this section it is, in our judgment, sufficient to say that, if a determination under

A the section binds persons other than parties to the original proceedings or their privies, it must do so by virtue of the language at the end of the section to which we have referred ; that no such words occur in s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923 ; and that in any case s. 6 of the Act of 1933 appears to contemplate a right in a party affected to apply to the court for a review of the earlier decision. It is also, we think, pertinent to bear in mind the circumstances in
B which determinations may have to be made by county courts, not infrequently on applications where one or both parties may be legally unrepresented, and, therefore, at a considerable disadvantage in presenting to the judge the relevant law or facts.

A forceful argument was put to the court based on the inconvenience and hardship which would result if the plaintiff were to succeed, and it is true
C that the advantages of certainty and finality are considerable in cases arising under the Acts where, as often as not, one or both of the parties concerned are persons of slender means. Moreover, in the present case the first defendants fixed the present contractual rent of £280 per annum on the faith of the Kerner decision (1), and, no doubt, the purchase price paid by the second defendants for the whole block of flats was in some degree influenced by that
D rent. In our judgment, however, the argument of inconvenience and hardship cannot overcome the difficulties which we have indicated. Nor, after all, is the inconvenience likely to be so very great in practice. A new tenant under a new tenancy would in the normal case be at a great disadvantage if he sought in effect to upset a previous determination duly litigated between the parties to an earlier contract. All the relevant facts would be in the possession of E the landlord. It is true that a landlord might seek to harass subsequent tenants in an attempt to improve on an earlier decision given against him, but he would be liable to somewhat severe cross-examination on the material of the earlier decision, and in any case he could not presumably harass any one tenant more than once. The present case may work a hardship on the defendant companies if the plaintiff ultimately succeeds, but the hardship is, after all,
F no greater than that suffered by any landlord who fixes a rent on a bona fide but mistaken belief as to his rights, and under our system of law a decision by this court or the House of Lords overruling some earlier case at first instance may upset many a calculation based on the latter's authority. In the result, therefore, and for the reasons we have stated, we think this appeal should be allowed, and that the case should be remitted to the county court to deter-
G mine the standard rent on the footing that the Kerner judgment (1) must in the present proceedings be regarded as res inter alios acta.

We were invited by counsel for the plaintiff, in the event that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on the main question, to go further and determine here and now the standard rent. Counsel argued that the court was in possession of all the relevant facts, and that in the light of the judgments of the House of H Lords in Palser v. Grinling (3), and having regard to the notorious rise in the cost of providing the material services between 1939 and 1944, we ought to hold that the Kerner letting was not excluded from the operation of the Acts and to fix the standard rent accordingly at £165 per annum. We do not think we ought to accede to this argument. The whole matter being, on the view we take, res integra between the parties, it is open to either side to raise any question of law or fact which they or she may think proper, and the question is, by the terms of s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1923, one specifically deputed to the county court. We think, however, it is right that we should make some observations on the Lord Chief Justice's judgment in the Kerner case (1). The case was referred to both in this court and in the House of Lords in Palser v. Grinling (3). In this court Morton, L.J., said in reference to it ([1946] 2 All E.R. 292):

> "The decision in that case may have been justified, having regard to the very wide admission made as to the services which constituted 'attendance'; but Lord Caldecote, C.J., is reported as saying: 'As to the meaning of "a substantial part of the rent," this could only be interpreted as meaning a real part and not a mere trifle. It could not mean half or a quarter or a third or anything of that sort; it meant something which could be recognised and ascertained and quantified.' If these observations are correctly reported, I am unable to agree with them." A B

The House of Lords did not approve the figures by way of percentage which Morton, L.J., had suggested as a guide, but the decision of this court was affirmed. No express reference is to be found in any of the speeches to the Kerner judgment (1), but Viscount Simon, however, said this ([1948] 1 All E.R. 11): C

> "It is plain that the phrase [i.e., 'substantial portion'] requires a comparison with the whole rent, and the whole rent means the entire contractual rent payable by the tenant in return for the occupation of the premises together with all the other covenants of the landlord. 'Substantial' in this connection is not the same as 'not unsubstantial,' i.e., just enough to avoid the de minimis principle. One of the primary meanings of the word is equivalent to considerable, solid, or big. It is in this sense that we speak of a substantial fortune, a substantial meal, a substantial man, a substantial argument or ground of defence. Applying the word in this sense, it must be left to the discretion of the judge of fact to decide as best he can according to the circumstances in each case, the onus being on the landlord. If the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Palser's case (3) were to be understood as fixing percentages as a legal measure, that would be going beyond the powers of the judiciary." D E

We agree with the language of Morton, L.J., in the passage cited above. In our view, the judgment of Lord Caldecote, C.J., cannot be reconciled with the opinion of Lord Simon or with the opinions of the other noble Lords in Palser v. Grinling (3). The county court judge must, therefore, in the present case apply to the facts as he finds them the principles laid down by the House of Lords in Palser v. Grinling (3), and he should in the circumstances disregard the observations of Lord Caldecote, C.J., in the Kerner case (1). BOWMAN v. BOWMAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Vaisey, J.), May 13, 1949.]

Divorce—Petition within three years of marriage—Exceptional hardship suffered by petitioner—Exceptional depravity on part of respondent—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 1 (1).

A A wife sought leave of the court on the ground of exceptional hardship suffered by her or exceptional depravity on the part of the husband, within the meaning of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 1 (1), to present a petition for divorce although three years had not passed since the date of the marriage. Her affidavit in support of her application contained 23 paragraphs, 21 of which dealt with the alleged depravity of the husband, B and one of which alleged hardship which would be suffered by her by reason of the fact that a material witness was about to leave the United Kingdom so that that witness's evidence would not be available except on commission unless the petition were presented immediately.

HELD : the departure of the material witness from the United Kingdom would not alone be an exceptional hardship suffered by the wife, but, C taking into account the facts alleged as to the conduct of the husband, her affidavit disclosed exceptional hardship suffered by her.

Per DENNING, L.J. : If there is nothing more than adultery with one person within the first three years of marriage that may be considered ordinary depravity. There is, I am sorry to say, nothing exceptional about that situation, and it does not involve exceptional hardship on the D applicant. If, however, the adultery is coupled with other matrimonial offences, e.g., if a husband not only commits adultery, but also deserts his wife in favour of another woman, or if he is cruel to her, thus causing her not only distress by his adultery but also injury by his violence, then, even if his offence cannot be stigmatised as exceptional depravity on his part, nevertheless, it does involve exceptional hardship suffered by the E wife. Even when the adultery is not coupled with desertion or cruelty, it may be committed in such aggravating circumstances as to show exceptional depravity, and, even if the adultery is not coupled with another matrimonial offence, nevertheless, its consequences may involve exceptional hardship to the applicant, as, for instance, when a wife as a result of her adultery has a child by another man so that the husband, F if he took her back, would have to maintain another man's child. The husband who commits adultery within a few weeks of marriage, or who commits adultery promiscuously with more than one woman, or with his wife's sister, or with a servant in the house, may probably be labelled as exceptionally depraved. Cruelty again, by itself, is not exceptional, but, if it is coupled with aggravating circumstances, as, for instance, drunken- G ness and neglect, or if it is exceptionally brutal or dangerous to health, then, even if it does not evidence exceptional depravity on the part of the respondent, it does, at least, cause exceptional hardship to the applicant. If it is coupled with perverted lust, it shows exceptional depravity on the part of the proposed respondent. The really important consideration in all these cases is to see whether there is any chance of H reconciliation. On this point it is most material to inquire what the applicant has already done to try to make the marriage a success or to become reconciled. If the court is not satisfied that all which is reasonable has been done in this respect, it may well dismiss the application.

[AS TO PETITION WITHIN THREE YEARS OF MARRIAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Supplement, Vol. 10, para. 971.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1937 (c. 57), s. 1, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 30, p. 336.]

Appeal by the husband from an order of His Honour Judge Norris, sitting as a commissioner in divorce on Apr. 20, 1949, by which he granted, on the grounds of exceptional hardship suffered by the wife, leave to the wife to present a petition for divorce within three years of the marriage. The Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision.

William Phillips for the husband.

Fairweather for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : Counsel for the husband has contended that it is clear that the commissioner did not grant the wife's application on the ground of exceptional depravity on the part of the husband. One ground on which he appears to have acted was that the wife desired to call to prove the adultery a witness who was about to go abroad early in June, 1949. Once this witness had left the country, it was contended for the wife, it might be impossible to prove the adultery. Of course, it might be possible to take her evidence on commission, and, if that matter had stood alone, I cannot see that it constituted an exceptional hardship suffered by the wife. I think, however, I may assume that the commissioner, in coming to his conclusion, took into consideration the facts alleged as to the conduct of the husband in 21 paragraphs of the wife's affidavit. If they were true, I think it would, indeed, be an exceptional hardship on the wife that this marriage should be kept in being for the three years. There was, for instance, an incident alleged in a motor car and another incident when the husband is alleged to have said to his wife : "If I can get my hands on you I will murder you." This conduct of the husband during the first six weeks of marriage must be material on the issue whether extraordinary hardship was suffered by the wife. There is no reason to think that the commissioner exercised his discretion wrongly and I think the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J. : This case raises the question in what circumstances leave ought to be given to a spouse to present a petition for divorce within three years of the marriage. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 1 (1) that leave can only be granted on the ground of exceptional hardship suffered by the would-be petitioner or of exceptional depravity on the part of the proposed respondent. The answer depends on the use of the word "exceptional." The case put forward by the applicant must disclose "exceptional" depravity on the part of the other spouse or "exceptional" hardship suffered by the applicant. This involves an inquiry into the degree of depravity alleged or the degree of hardship said to be suffered—an inquiry which, it is plain, may prove to be a difficult task, and it is not surprising that different judges have interpreted the provisions of s. 1 (1) in different ways.

The only cases in which the question arises are, of course, those of adultery or of cruelty. If there is nothing more than adultery with one person within the first three years of marriage that may be considered ordinary depravity. There is, I am sorry to say, nothing exceptional about that situation, and it does not involve exceptional hardship on the innocent spouse, the applicant. The distress that it causes is one which many have to endure. If, however, the adultery is coupled with other matrimonial offences, e.g., if a husband not only commits adultery, but also deserts his wife in favour of another woman, or if he is cruel to her, thus causing her not only distress by his adultery but also injury by his violence, then, even if his offence cannot be stigmatised as exceptional depravity on his part, nevertheless, it does involve exceptional hardship suffered by the wife. Even if the adultery is not coupled with another matrimonial offence, nevertheless its consequences may involve exceptional hardship to the applicant, as, for instance, when a wife as a result of her adultery has a child by another man so that the husband, if he took her back, would have to maintain another man's child, or it may be committed in such aggravating circumstances as to show exceptional depravity. The husband who commits adultery within a few weeks of marriage, or who commits adultery promiscuously with more than one woman or with his wife's sister, or with a servant in the house, may probably be labelled as exceptionally depraved. Such, at least, are instances in which, when sitting in chambers, I have given leave to a spouse to present a petition for divorce within three years of marriage.

A Cruelty again, by itself, is, I fear, not exceptional, but, if it is coupled with aggravating circumstances, as, for instance, drunkenness and neglect, or if it is exceptionally brutal or dangerous to health, then, even if it does not evidence exceptional depravity on the part of the respondent, it does, at least, cause exceptional hardship to the applicant. If it is coupled with perverted lust, it shows exceptional depravity on the part of the proposed respondent.

B The really important consideration in all these cases is to see whether there is any chance of reconciliation. On this point it is most material to inquire what the applicant has already done to try to make the marriage a success or to become reconciled. Is the breakdown of the marriage due to any failing or maladjustment on the part of the spouse who applies to launch her petition within three years of the marriage ? Has the applicant consulted a probation officer or anyone else specially qualified to help ? If the court is not satisfied C that all which is reasonable has been done in this respect, it may well dismiss the application. In this case, the wife, in her affidavit in support of her application, charged her husband not only with adultery, but with cruelty and perverted lust. She has consulted a psychiatrist about her husband. There is, it is clear, no chance of reconciliation. The judge has thought it a proper case in which to grant leave to present the petition within three years of the marriage D and I do not see that he has gone wrong in principle. If the wife is lying in her statements as to the grounds of the petition, they will be investigated at the hearing of the petition and the judge will see that she gains no advantage by her lies. The Act gives him ample powers in this respect.

G Negligence—Dangerous article—Inflammable material—Delivery by defendants to plaintiffs by mistake—Explosion caused by cigarette of plaintiffs' employee —Liability of defendants.

H Five packing cases containing dangerously inflammable celluloid film scrap were delivered in error by a carter employed by the defendants to the plaintiffs' premises. No warning of their dangerous contents was given by the carter, by the delivery note, or by labels on the cases, but the plaintiffs' foreman recognised the material as inflammable and dangerous when some of it was taken out of one of the cases. He warned the two workmen in charge of the cases not to smoke near them, instructed them to replace the scrap and remove the cases to the yard, and telephoned to the firm who had sent them and arranged to deliver them to their proper destination 150 yards away. Before the cases were moved a typist employed by the plaintiffs negligently set light to it with a cigarette and it exploded causing serious damage.

Held: the defendants were negligent in not taking proper precautions when dealing with such dangerous material; there had been no negligence by the plaintiffs or their servants apart from the typist; and, as she had not intended to injure her employers' premises or do more than perpetrate a joke, her behaviour was not such a conscious act of volition as to relieve the defendants from liability for their negligence.

Action for damages for negligence.

A carter employed by the defendants by mistake delivered five packing cases to the premises of the plaintiffs who were wireless manufacturers. The cases contained highly inflammable and dangerous celluloid film scrap, but no indication of the character of their contents was given by the carter, by label on the cases, or by the delivery note. One of the cases was opened by two of the plaintiffs' employees who took out some of the scrap in the receiving department of the plaintiffs' premises. These employees, who had expected to find wireless parts in the case, did not know what the contents were. The plaintiffs' foreman, however, recognised them as inflammable and dangerous film scrap. He warned the two employees not to smoke in that part of the receiving department and instructed them to put back the scrap taken out, to replace the lid on the case, and to remove the cases to the yard. He then telephoned to the defendants, and, on learning of the proper destination of the cases, which was some 150 yards away, he undertook to deliver them there. In the meantime a typist from the plaintiffs' office with a lighted cigarette negligently set light to the film scrap before it was all replaced in its case and an explosion occurred causing serious damage. The defendants admitted that they knew that the scrap was highly inflammable and dangerous and it was conceded in argument that they had been negligent in delivering the cases to the wrong address. They contended that the proximate cause of the accident was the typist's act, which, they alleged, was deliberate, in applying a lighted cigarette to the material, and that the chain of causation was broken by her conscious act. They relied on contributory negligence and on the maxim volenti non fit injuria. Jones, J., found for the plaintiffs.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and Ryder Richardson for the plaintiffs.
Aiken Watson, K.C., and Colin Duncan for the defendants.

JONES, J.: The plaintiffs claim in respect of damage which they allege they have sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendants in sending to their (the plaintiffs') premises material which was dangerous, as a result of which there was an explosion at the premises. [His Lordship recited the facts, held that the explosion was the result of the thoughtless act of the typist in setting fire to the material with a cigarette, found that there was no negligence on the part of the plaintiffs or on the part of any of their servants other than the typist, and continued:] So far as volenti non fit injuria goes, the argument that that is a good defence is based on the alleged acceptance by a servant of the plaintiffs of this material by saying that he would deliver it to its proper destination, and it is suggested that, by so saying, he accepted it, that he had no fear of it and was prepared to take any risk of what might happen. I should have thought that what was in this employee's mind was the exact opposite and that he wanted to get rid of it as soon as possible. Therefore I come to the conclusion that there is no substance in the defence

A volenti non fit injuria.

There remains the difficult question whether the typist's intervention broke the chain of causation so as to relieve the defendants of liability. Among the cases to which I have been referred is a passage from a judgment of the Privy Council in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins & Perkins (1), which was delivered by LORD DUNEDIN, who said ([1909] A.C. 646) :

> " It has, however, again and again been held that in the case of articles dangerous in themselves, such as loaded firearms, poisons, explosives, and other things ejusdem generis, there is a peculiar duty to take precaution imposed upon those who send forth or instal such articles when it is necessarily the case that other parties will come within their proximity. The duty being to take precaution, it is no excuse to say that the accident
> C would not have happened unless some other agency than that of the defendant had intermeddled with the matter. A loaded gun will not go off unless some one pulls the trigger, a poison is innocuous unless some one takes it, gas will not explode unless it is mixed with air and then a light is set to it. Yet the cases of Dixon v. Bell (2), Thomas v. Winchester (3) and Parry v. Smith (4), are all illustrations of liability enforced. On the > D other hand, if the proximate cause of the accident is not the negligence of the defendant, but the conscious act of another volition, then he will not be liable. For against such conscious act of volition no precaution can really avail. In applying these principles to the facts in hand the basis of consideration must be sought in the findings of the jury, unless it can be said of these findings that they are incapable of support by the evidence."

That indicates that in any case the facts are of the utmost importance. I am not in possession of full information as to exactly what happened here, but the inference I draw with regard to this typist is that she had no intention of doing any damage. I cannot conceive that she should have desired to injure the premises of her employers, and that in that sense she was unconscious
F rather than conscious of doing anything that was negligent. I cannot believe that she meant more than to perpetrate a joke. The conclusion I draw is that there cannot have been very much of this material outside the case when she came along and that probably all she meant to do was to make a small and innocuous bonfire of some of the material which she probably took to be ordinary packing. Taking that view of the facts and drawing those conclusions from
G them and from what evidence there is, I hold that this behaviour on her part was not such a conscious act of volition as to relieve the defendants from liability for their admitted negligence. In my view, they should have contemplated the possibility of what in fact happened—that, if they delivered this dangerous, inflammable, and explosive material at the wrong place, it would probably be handled by persons without any knowledge of its character who might easily
H in complete innocence allow it to come in contact with a lighted match or cigarette in view of the fact that smoking is prevalent in workshops and factories except where it is forbidden for reasons of safety or security. In those circumstances, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the defendants are liable, and there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for damages to be assessed.

Income Tax—Deduction—Management expenses—Investment company—Expenses of changing investments—Brokerage and stamp duty—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 33 (1).

The Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 33 (1), provides : " Where . . . any company whose business consists mainly in the making of investments, and the principal part of whose income is derived therefrom . . . claims and proves to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that, for any year of assessment, it has been charged to tax by deduction or otherwise . . . the company . . . shall be entitled to repayment of so much of the tax paid by it as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management (including commissions) for that year . . ."

An investment company within s. 33 (1) sought to include in its management expenses sums disbursed for brokerage and stamp duty in changing its investments.

Held : such disbursements were not " expenses of management " within s. 33 (1).

[As to Allowance for Management Expenses, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, pp. 135-137, paras. 267-273 ; and for Cases, see DIGEST, Vol. 28, pp. 55, 56, No. 283, and Supplement.]

Case Stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

It was stated in the Case that for many years it had been the practice of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, in examining claims under s. 33 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, made by investment trust companies (including the appellant company), to offer no objection to the inclusion of sums disbursed by way of brokerage and stamp duties in connection with changes of investments as distinct from investments representing capital expansion, but that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue had informed the appellant company that they were no longer prepared to regard such expenditure as allowable. The Special Commissioners found that the expenses of changing investments were not expenses of management, and, therefore not allowable, and, on the present appeal by the company, their decision was upheld by Croom-Johnson, J.

Grant, K.C., and Talbot, K.C., for the company.
Donovan, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : Where any company whose business consists mainly in the making of investments and the principal part of whose income is derived therefrom claims and proves to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that for any year of assessment it has been charged to income tax by deduction at the source by the persons paying its income from investments, it has the right, under s. 33 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, to repayment of so much of the tax paid by deduction as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management (including commissions) for that year. The company in the present case, which is an investment company having all its income taxed at the source, made a claim including the amount now in question which was in respect of expenses paid by the company in changing its investments in the course of conducting the familiar process of selling out investments the quotations of which had gone up in the market and either getting in again lower down, or buying other stock with the view to capital appreciation in the future. The Special Commissioners rejected the claim and the company now appeal.

The only question is whether the company has proved that the expenses in question are expenses of management. The facts are not in dispute, and I have to determine whether it is right, as a matter of law, to say that the expression "expenses of management" covers expenses of this nature. It A may be thought that the expenditure contemplated by s. 33 is something which would be deductible as a sum of money wholly and exclusively expended for the purpose of making profits and gains within r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, and, accordingly, that any expenditure partaking of a capital nature is not aimed at by the section. I do not find it necessary, for the purposes of the present decision, to express an opinion B on that point, which I confess I find rather attractive, but it seems to me that it is impossible for the company here to say, on the facts as proved, not only that as a matter of law these payments are expenses of management, but that the commissioners ought to have been satisfied that they were. I do not think they are expenses of management, although, no doubt, it was judicious for the company to do what was done. If they are not expenses C of management, then the sub-section is not satisfied and the company is not entitled to relief under it. I cannot see how, giving the expression "management" its ordinary everyday meaning, it can possibly be said, with regard to an investment company, that the cost of stamps on transfers and contract notes and brokers' remuneration can be said to be expenses of the management of the company. It is, no doubt, incidental to the business of an investment D company, but I do not think it is within the expression which is used, giving it, as I must give it, its ordinary meaning.

The only other point left in the case is that the section refers to "commissions." I think that that reference is not apt to cover a stockbroker's remuneration, which is calculated as a commission, in making bargains on behalf of the company. The section is aimed at something quite E different—managing a concern where somebody gets, as part of his remuneration, perhaps, a commission on income, or something of that sort. I should be disposed to think that these transactions partook of the character of capital transactions rather than income, but I do not decide that point. I do not think it necessary that I should go through all the reasons that the commissioners gave. Some of them, perhaps, may be open to criticism. In F my opinion, the commissioners arrived at a right conclusion and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

County Court—Appeal—"Debt or damage claimed"—Claim exceeding £20—Action claiming £21 10*s.*—Payment of £10 by defendant after commencement of action but before service of particulars of claim—County Courts Act, 1934 (c. 53), s. 105, proviso (a). A

The County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, gives a right of appeal to the B Court of Appeal from a decision of a county court judge on any point of law or equity: "Provided that, without the leave of the judge, there shall be no appeal (a) in any action founded on contract or on tort (other than an action for the recovery of land or an action in which the title to any hereditament has come in question) where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed £20 . . ." C

The plaintiff bought a second-hand typewriter from the defendant for £20, and spent £11 10*s.* in having it overhauled. Later, the typewriter was found to have been stolen and the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant claiming the repayment of the purchase price, less a sum of £10 which had been repaid on account, and also the sum of £11 10*s.* as damages for breach of warranty, the total amount claimed being £21 10*s.* D After the particulars of claim had been handed in to the county court officer, but before he had served them on the defendant, the defendant paid a further £10 to the plaintiff. The particulars were not amended, but at the trial of the action it was agreed that the plaintiff's claim at the date of the hearing was for £11 10*s.* and costs. The county court judge found that the plaintiff did the ordinary and natural thing in having E the typewriter overhauled, but held that the amount spent thereon was not a loss due to the fact that the defendant had sold an article which he should not have sold, and gave judgment for the defendant with costs on Scale B., i.e., the scale applicable where the amount claimed was greater than £20 and less than £50. On an appeal by the plaintiff from the judge's decision, the defendant took the preliminary objection that the claim was in reality F only for £11 10*s.* and not for £21 10*s.*, and, therefore, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, proviso (a), there was no right of appeal without leave of the judge, which had not been obtained.

HELD: (i) the words "debt or damage claimed," in proviso (a) to the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, meant claimed at the moment when the writ or plaint was issued in view of the state of affairs then existing, and the G amount claimed by the plaintiff within the meaning of the proviso was the sum of £21 10*s.*, notwithstanding that the defendant had paid £10 before the action went to trial and before the particulars of claim had been served on him, and, therefore, as the amount "claimed" was over £20, proviso (a) to s. 105 did not apply and the plaintiff had a right of appeal without leave of the judge. Mayer v. Burgess (1855) (4 E. & B. 655), criticised and distinguished.

(ii) as the plaintiff did the ordinary and natural thing in having the typewriter overhauled, the sum of £11 10*s.* spent thereon was a "loss directly and naturally resulting . . . from the breach of warranty," within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 53 (2), and the plaintiff was entitled to recover that sum.

Per Lord Greene, M.R. : No exception in the case of disturbance by title paramount could be implied in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 12 (2) which provides that in a contract of sale of goods there is an implied warranty "that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods."

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour Judge Pugh, at Bow County Court, dated Feb. 10, 1949.

The plaintiff bought from the defendant a typewriter which was later found to have been stolen. She brought an action in the county court claiming the repayment of the £20 paid for the typewriter, less the sum of £10 already repaid to her by the defendant, and £11 10*s.* (the amount paid by the plaintiff in having the typewriter overhauled), as damages for breach of warranty, the claim, as set out in the particulars of claim, amounting to £21 10s. After the action was begun, but before the particulars of claim were served on the defendant, he paid another £10 to the plaintiff, and denied liability for the £11 10*s.* The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant with costs on Scale B. On an appeal by the plaintiff from this decision the defendant took the preliminary objection that, under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, proviso (a), no appeal lay without leave of the judge, the amount claimed at the trial being under £20. The Court of Appeal now overruled the preliminary objection and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The facts appear in the judgment of Lord Greene, M.R., on the preliminary objection.

LORD GREENE, M.R. [giving judgment on the preliminary objection:] The action which has given rise to the present appeal was an action in the Bow County Court in which the plaintiff was claiming against the defendant a certain sum in the following circumstances. In January, 1947, she purchased from the defendant a second-hand typewriter for £20. She had it overhauled, which cost her £11 10*s.*, with the result that she was out of pocket to the extent of £31 10*s.* Unfortunately, the typewriter turned out to have been stolen, and, accordingly, the plaintiff, as purchaser, acquired no title to it whatsoever. She brought an action against the defendant claiming repayment of the £20, less £10 which had been repaid on account, and also the £11 10*s.*, by way of damages for breach of warranty. The particulars of claim were dated Dec. 30, 1948. They set out the facts relating to the £31 10*s*. and they gave credit for a repayment by the defendant to the plaintiff on Dec. 1, 1948, of a sum of £10. The claim, therefore, was a claim for the balance of £21 10*s*. The particulars were handed to the county court officer who did not serve them until Jan. 13, 1949. On Jan. 4, 1949, the defendant's wife had written to the plaintiff's solicitors, enclosing a further £10. That was acknowledged on Jan. 5, 1949, by the plaintiff's solicitors in the following terms :

> "We are obliged by Mrs. Burningham's letter of yesterday inclosing £10. This leaves a balance in respect of the debt amounting to £11 10*s*."

On Jan. 22 particulars of defence were put in stating that the defendant had repaid the sum of £20 and denying any liability for the £11 10*s*. The £20 thus referred to was made up of the £10 which had been paid before the lodging of the particulars of claim and the £10 which was paid on Jan. 4. The action went to trial. No amendment of the particulars had been made, and on the face of the particulars the claim as it came before the county court judge was for £21 10*s*. When the case was opened it appears from an agreed note prepared by the two solicitors that the solicitor for the plaintiff either stated that it had been agreed, or that it was then and there agreed, that the defendant had paid the plaintiff a second sum of £10 after the date on which the summons was issued and that the plaintiff's claim on the date of the hearing was for £11 10*s*. and costs. The action proceeded and the plaintiff failed to recover that £11 10*s*: The result was that the action was dismissed, and judgment was entered for the defendant with costs on Scale B, under the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, rr. 5 (2) and 6, the scale applicable in cases where a defendant is successful in an action in the county court where the amount claimed is greater than £20 and not greater than £50. The judge, in awarding costs on Scale B, did so, as it seems to me, clearly on the footing that that was the scale applicable in view of the amount claimed. The position, therefore, was that the defendant was given costs on the footing that he had been successful in an action in which the amount claimed was over £20.

The plaintiff is appealing against the judgment because, she maintains, she ought to have obtained judgment for £11 10*s*. The defendant takes a preliminary point and says that, in view of the fact that the amount claimed in the action ought, on a true view, to be taken as £11 10*s*. only, no appeal lies without leave of the judge, and, no such leave having been obtained, this court has no jurisdiction to hear the plaintiff's appeal. The relevant section of the County Courts Act, 1934, is s. 105. Proviso (a) to that section, which gives the right of appeal, is as follows :

> "Provided that, without the leave of the judge, there shall be no appeal (a) in any action founded on contract or on tort (other than an action for the recovery of land or an action in which the title to any hereditament has come in question) where the debt or damage claimed does not exceed £20."

The controversy between the parties turns, in my opinion, on the true construction of the phrase "debt or damage claimed." On behalf of the plaintiff it is said that the claim was fixed at the time when the particulars were issued, and at that date and all through the hearing and right down to the end the claim on the face of the particulars was £21 10*s*. It was also said that, to issue her plaint, the plaintiff had to pay fees relevant to a claim for £21 10*s*., and she was forced to do that because when she first started her proceedings the defendant was in default. He owed her £21 10*s*. and the only way she could recover it was by taking proceedings against him. It was pointed out, moreover, that when the matter was tried, the judge gave the defendant costs on a scale which was only applicable to a claim of that amount. It was said that the defendant, having had that benefit, is now turning round and saying that the claim must be treated for the purpose of the right to appeal as a claim only for the balance of £11 10*s*. The defendant's case is that one must see what was the substance of the position when the case was opened before the county court judge and that the claim for the present purpose is that which was then put forward and not that which appeared on the pleadings or existed when the pleadings were issued. On the face of the pleading and at the moment when the pleading was issued and in view of the circumstances warranting its issue the claim was for £21 10*s*., but, it is argued, that claim must be taken as having been, in effect, amended so as to make it a claim only for £11 10*s*. Although no formal amendment was ever made, it is contended, as soon as it was agreed that all that the plaintiff could get judgment for was £11 10*s*., the claim which up to that date was properly described as a claim for more than £20 had ceased to be a claim for more than £20 and had become a claim for £11 10*s*. As I have said, this case is really a question of construction of the words " debt or damage claimed." If " claimed " means claimed on the face of the pleading or claimed at the moment when the pleading was issued in view of the state of affairs then existing, then clearly the defendant is in the wrong. If, on the other hand, " claimed " means that claim as reduced by something which happened since, then the defendant is right.

There is one matter which appears to me to throw a very important light on the whole of this controversy. It is impossible, to my mind, to treat the construction of the phrase " debt or damage claimed " in this proviso without reference to the County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 47, r. 6, which provides that the costs of a defendant are, in the circumstances there mentioned, to be determined " by the amount claimed," and as regards the costs of the plaintiff, " by the amount recovered." If the plaintiff had succeeded in her claim for £11 10*s*., I ask myself what would have been the amount which she could be said to have recovered in the action. It is to be observed that the rule says " the amount recovered," and not " the amount of the judgment recovered."

As one step in the construction of those words I may refer to Pearce v. Bolton (1), a decision of a Divisional Court consisting of CHANNELL, J., DARLING, J. (who dissented), and LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. In that case the true meaning of the phrase " recovered in the action " had to be construed, the circumstances being that, after the writ had been served, the defendant made a payment on account and the plaintiff only recovered the balance. The question was whether the amount recovered for the purposes of costs was not merely the amount of the judgment, but the amount of what had been paid on account plus the amount actually recovered by the judgment. It was decided that the proper amount was the total of those two sums because, although the amount paid on account was not part of the judgment, nevertheless it was " recovered in the action " within the meaning of the County Courts Act, 1888, s. 116 (the section there under construction). CHANNELL, J., referring to the sum in question, which was £27, said ([1902] 2 K.B. 114) :

> ". . . the whole of that sum has got into the pockets of the plaintiffs since they brought their action . . . If the plaintiffs had stated in their particulars that the £8 for which they gave credit had been paid since the action was brought, and had claimed the balance—£19—only, and had got judgment for that sum, then it would have appeared on the proceedings that they had got, since action brought, the whole sum they claimed . . ."

The matter was taken a little further by Lamb Brothers v. Keeping (2), also in the Divisional Court. In that case the amount paid on account had been paid by the defendant after the issue of the writ but before he knew it had been issued, and it was argued that Pearce v. Bolton (1) did not cover the case on the ground that it was not knowledge that the writ had been issued that resulted in the defendant making the payment on account. That argument was overruled by the Divisional Court, consisting of Ridley and Bray, JJ., who said that the fact that the defendant did not know that the writ had been issued did not distinguish the case from Pearce v. Bolton (1), and that, according to the latter decision, the sum in question had been recovered in the action. If that decision be right, the result in this case would be that, had the plaintiff succeeded in getting judgment for £11 10*s*., she would have been entitled to costs on the scale applicable to a sum recovered of £21 10*s*., because she would A have recovered that sum since the issue of her proceedings partly by payment on account and partly by her judgment, and for the purpose, therefore, of costs she would have been entitled to costs on the basis of £21 10*s*., the basis on which she had already paid the necessary fees when she started her proceedings. Correspondingly, the defendant in this case, having succeeded in the action, gets his costs on the basis that he had succeeded, not in resisting a claim for £11 B 10*s*., but in resisting a claim for £21 10*s*.

In my opinion, this decision of the Divisional Court, which counsel for the defendant has criticised, was perfectly right. It appears to me that, if it were not right, all kinds of refinements might arise. A man who knew that a writ was on the point of being issued and made a payment on account after it had been issued but before the plaintiff could have brought to his notice that it C had been issued could then say : "The amount that you have recovered is not recovered in the action." That appears to me to produce a very unreal situation because, as all of us know, people often pay up when a writ has been issued, and to say that a matter of seconds one way or the other in such a case may make all the difference appears to me to ignore the substance of the position. In the present case the amount paid on account was received after the plaint D was issued, and it appears to me, on the authority of Lamb Brothers v. Keeping (2), that the defendant cannot say that the amount which would have been recovered by the plaintiff would only have been £11 10*s*., within the meaning of the rule. Similarly, the defendant having got costs applicable to a claim for £21 10*s*. (without any protest that he was getting too much and without any scintilla of suggestion that the judge was asked to exercise, E or that he was exercising, any discretion), it seems to me that was rightly based, and must have been based, on the view, which, in my opinion, was the correct view, that the claim must be treated as a claim for £21 10*s*. The justice of the case seems to me to be secured by that when one remembers that, owing to the default of the defendant, the plaintiff is bound to issue his writ, he is bound to pay the fees applicable to the amount which he claims when F he issues his writ, and that, if it is afterwards going to be said that his claim was a claim for the lesser amount, the result would be that the defendant would be saved from having to pay fees referable to the higher amount which, by the defendant's default, the plaintiff was bound to claim.

There are some authorities which have been referred to, and I think I need only mention two of them. One, which, frankly, I feel some difficulty in under- G standing as it is reported, is Mayer v. Burgess (3). The County Courts Act, 1846, s. 58, had conferred on the county courts jurisdiction up to £20, and there was no appeal. The County Courts Act, 1850, s. 1, extended the jurisdiction to £50 and, by s. 14, gave a right of appeal in cases in which the claims exceeded the jurisdiction conferred by the Act of 1846. The case in question was brought in the county court after the passing of the Act of 1850. The plaintiff's demand H on the face of his particulars was for £21 1*s*. as damages from the defendant on three stated grounds. There was nothing, as I read the report, on the face of that claim to suggest that the amount claimed was not a perfectly correct amount claimed in law, and, had such an action been brought before the passing of the second of those two Acts, the county court would have been bound, in my opinion, to disclaim jurisdiction, because it would have had presented to it a claim for more than £20. In the trial of the action it was established that the plaintiff's right was confined to a sum of £12 17*s.* 8*d.* It was argued by counsel for the defendant, who was objecting to the right of appeal, that the case must be regarded as though the claim was one for £12 17*s.* 8*d.*, and he said (4 E. & B. 658):

> "Here the amount really sued for was £12 17*s.* 8*d.*, the amount of the debt and costs. The defendant was answerable to the plaintiff for no more."

That, as I have said, was only brought out when the action came to trial. Counsel for the plaintiff said (ibid., 659):

> "The language of s. 58 of [the County Courts Act, 1846] is 'Where the debt or damage claimed is not more than £20': and the legislature must have had in view the amount claimed, not the amount ultimately recovered: otherwise the jurisdiction would depend upon the result of the cause, which may be uncertain to the last. The amount claimed is that for which the plaint is entered and the fees paid."

In a very short report of the judgment LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., said (ibid.) (and COLERIDGE, WIGHTMAN and CROMPTON, JJ., concurred):

> "We must look at the real nature of the cause, not at the amount claimed. It is clear that here so much as £20 could not have been recovered; so that there was jurisdiction under [the County Courts Act, 1846], s. 58 . . ."

I cannot understand that. The claim was for £20 1*s.*, and on the footing of that, with great respect, I cannot see how it can have been said on the facts as reported that there would have been jurisdiction under the County Courts Act, 1846. If the plaint had been brought to the county court before the Act of 1850 was passed, the county court would have been bound to reject it. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., went on to say that there was jurisdiction under the earlier Act and that it was not given by the later Act, in which case only an appeal lay. That I follow. If there had been jurisdiction under the earlier Act, the later Act was not necessary to give that jurisdiction, and, as the right of appeal was only given in cases where the later Act came into operation the decision would have been intelligible. I cannot help thinking that this was a case where there was evidence of mala fides of some sort in the formulation of the original claim. If it was a case where the court came to the conclusion that the original claim had been written up to £20 1*s.* mala fide for the sole purpose of obtaining a right of appeal, the court might very well have taken a strong line and treated the matter as a genuine claim for £20 1*s.* On that basis I can understand the decision. I am bound to say, with all respect, that, apart from some consideration of that sort, I cannot understand it. I cannot take it as compelling me in any way to decide in favour of the defendant in this case.

North v. Holroyd (4), which was also cited, was an action in which the particulars of claim started with the sum of £54 and set out various reductions which brought it down to £19 12*s.*, but on the face of the particulars it appeared that there was a miscalculation as a result of which the balance owing was made out to be £19 12*s.* That was the amount actually claimed, but the miscalculation, as I say, was apparent on the face of the particulars, and, when it was pointed out to the judge, he had the particulars amended, which had the effect of bringing the amount up to £20 12*s.*, the true figure. The amendment, it seems to me, although formally desirable, was not necessary in that case because on the true construction of the particulars the amount of the claim was that arrived at by deducting the stated deductions from the £54. The fact that there was a mis-casting somewhere in the document does not seem to me to make it anything but a claim for the true figure of £20 12*s.* In giving judgment KELLY, C.B., said (L.R. 3 Exch. 71):

> "The particulars of demand claim the balance of an account. It is true that a sum of £19 12*s*. only is claimed in form; but the amount really claimed is the balance of £54, after the deduction of certain items, the miscalculation of one of which reduces the claim to the sum named. In substance, therefore, it is a claim not to £19 12*s*., but to £20 12*s*., and the plaintiff would have been entitled to have his particulars amended so as to enable him to claim that sum; such an amendment would be made as a matter of course." A

It seems to me that the phrase the "substance" of the matter is used there with a very different meaning from that which counsel for the defendant wishes to give it in this case. The substance of the matter there was that the claim was for the larger amount. The substance of the matter here was nothing of the kind. The claim was for the larger amount in truth and in B fact, but the position had been changed by something that had happened since the claim was formulated and which could only have been corrected by way of amendment, if it had been asked for, by altering the amount claimed in truth and in fact, not in correcting a mere slip. I do not read that case, either, as carrying the defendant's argument any further. In the result, the preliminary point, in my opinion, fails. C

EVERSHED, L.J.: I agree, and I only venture to add one word about Mayer v. Burgess (3), to which my Lord has referred, because in the COUNTY COURT PRACTICE, 1948, p. 128, in the notes to the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 105, the case is cited as authority for this proposition:

> ". . . if the nature of the case is such that the judge cannot lawfully give higher damages than £20, there is no right of appeal." D

That sentence, of itself, might, I think, lend colour at any rate to the view that the test should be applied when the judge came to deliver judgment. The MASTER OF THE ROLLS has pointed out that Mayer v. Burgess (3) is not entirely easy to follow for the reasons which he has stated, but it seems to me plain that what the court did eventually decide was that from the very beginning the E action in question had the quality that it was in reality and substance only a claim for a sum of less than £20. I think that limitation must be read into the sentence in the notes to s. 105 of the Act of 1934 in the COUNTY COURT PRACTICE, 1948. As my Lord has pointed out, in this case, at the time when the action started, it had the quality of being a claim for £21 10*s*. I agree that, unless it can be shown that it somehow lost that quality, it retained it for the purpose of F the construction of proviso (a) to s. 105, the words of which might have been, but are not, such as are used in s. 58 (1), "the only matter remaining to be tried." I add, finally, that, in a case where there had been an amendment of the plaint, the result might be different, but there had not been an amendment in this case, and I, therefore, prefer to say nothing further on that hypothesis.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree. G

Preliminary objection overruled.

Argument having been heard,

LORD GREENE, M.R.: I will ask SINGLETON, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The amount involved in this claim is quite small. H [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] Before the action was commenced the defendant had paid to the plaintiff a sum of £10 on account. After the issue of the plaint and before service of it he paid a further £10, and at the time of the hearing by the learned county court judge there was only left for consideration her claim for the balance of £11 10*s*., which was the amount it had cost her to have the typewriter put in order. By her particulars of claim she alleged, in para. 2:

> " In the contract of sale there was (a) an implied condition on the part of the defendant that he had a right to sell the typewriter and (b) an implied warranty that the plaintiff should have and enjoy quiet enjoyment thereof."

The case was heard by the learned county court judge on Feb. 10, 1949, and his judgment was in favour of the defendant, with costs on Scale " B." In the course of his judgment the learned judge said :

A
> " I agree that the plaintiff behaved in a common-sense way. She converted a good typewriter into a first-class one. She did the ordinary and natural thing."

I should say that the only evidence as to the condition of the typewriter was that of the plaintiff herself, who said that, when she tested it, it was " fairly good." No evidence was given by the defendant. The learned judge went on B to say :

> " It is natural to assume at first sight that the defendant must pay for this, but, if so, anything which a purchaser might naturally do must be a loss for which the defendant would be responsible. Is anything which the purchaser does to the article such a loss ? That cannot be. Suppose the C purchaser decided to paint the typewriter with gold paint, no one would argue that the defendant was liable. Yet, if the purchaser were a dealer, gold paint might add to its price."

In that passage the learned judge is failing to approach the matter in the right way. The question to be considered was whether or not it was the natural and ordinary thing that the purchaser of a second-hand typewriter of this D kind should have it overhauled, and the learned judge had already said that that was the fact, for he said: " She did the ordinary and natural thing." He went on to say :

> " I hold that the extra amount spent on the article by the plaintiff quite naturally is not a loss due to the fact that the defendant sold an article which he should not have sold. Although what the plaintiff did was right E and proper, I must decide against her."

Counsel for the plaintiff submitted to this court that that judgment was wrong. His argument was based almost wholly on two or three sections of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. He referred the court to two cases further back in date which are of interest. They are Bunny v. Hopkinson (5) and Rolph v. F Crouch (6), both of which have to do with land. In Bunny v. Hopkinson (5) :

> " A sold some building land to B, and he covenanted for title. After some houses had been built on the land, the purchaser was evicted. Held, that the purchaser was entitled to recover upon the covenants, not only the value of the land, but also that of the houses subsequently built thereon."

G SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., in the course of a very short judgment, said (27 Beav. 567) :

> " I am of opinion that the measure of the damages upon these covenants includes the amount expended in converting the land into the purposes for which it was sold."

H In Rolph v. Crouch (6) :

> " The defendant demised premises for a term of years to the plaintiff, and covenanted that the plaintiff should occupy the same during the term ' without any interruption whatsoever from or by the said defendant, his executors, etc., or any other person or persons lawfully claiming by, from, or under him or them.' An action of trespass was afterwards brought by a person claiming under the defendant against the plaintiff, who gave notice of it to the defendant. The defendant paid no attention to the notice, > and the plaintiff, acting on his own judgment and without express authority, defended the action. A verdict was eventually found against him, and he was obliged to pay damages and costs. In an action against the defendant, his landlord, for breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment contained in the demise : Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the costs and damages he had paid, and also the expenses he had himself incurred in defending the action of trespass." A

It appeared that there was a further claim to damages because the lessee had expended money in erecting a greenhouse on the land demised in reliance on the defendant's covenant and had lost the profits he would have acquired from the sale. SIR FITZROY KELLY, C.B., said (L.R. 3 Exch. 49) :

> " Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the plaintiff was justified in the course which he took, and therefore that the damages, costs and B expenses which he incurred in the action brought against him by Cook, are the natural and immediate consequence of the defendant's breach of covenant. . . Then, lastly, as to the conservatory. The plaintiff, relying on the performance by the defendant of his covenant, erected it for the better and more conveniently carrying on of his trade as a florist. He has lost the use of it, and I think that he is entitled to the sum given him by the jury for C that loss."

Those cases, though on different subject-matter, are in point, but really, to come to a decision, one has to look first at s. 12 and then at s. 53 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Section 12 provides :

> " In a contract of sale, unless the circumstances of the contract are such D as to show a different intention, there is (1) An implied condition on the part of the seller that in the case of a sale he has a right to sell the goods, and that in the case of an agreement to sell he will have a right to sell the goods at the time when the property is to pass : (2) An implied warranty that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods . . ."

The particulars of claim in this action claim fall under both heads, but in this court E counsel for the plaintiff has put forward only that there was breach of the implied warranty that the buyer should have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods. Counsel for the defendant admitted that there was a breach of the implied condition that he had a right to sell the goods, but he submitted that that breach would give rise only to a claim for the return of the money paid and would not give a general right of action for damages. It appears to me F that that matter has little to do with this case, because, in any event, if there was breach of the implied condition, the plaintiff was entitled to treat that as a breach of warranty.

Section 53 of the Act provides :

> " (1) Where there is a breach of warranty by the seller, or where the buyer G elects, or is compelled, to treat any breach of a condition on the part of the seller as a breach of warranty, the buyer is not by reason only of such breach of warranty entitled to reject the goods ; but he may (a) set up against the seller the breach of warranty in diminution or extinction of the price ; or (b) maintain an action against the seller for damages for the breach of warranty. (2) The measure of damages for breach of warranty is the H estimated loss directly and naturally resulting, in the ordinary course of events, from the breach of warranty."

Counsel for the defendant submitted that it was not shown that the defendant had any foreknowledge that this kind of damage might flow in case there was a breach. He further submitted that there was no evidence to show that the overhaul of the typewriter took place at once or soon after the purchase, and, unless that was shown, the damage would not flow and did not flow naturally from the breach. No such point as the second was raised at the hearing in the court below, and no suggestion whatever was made to the plaintiff that she did not send the typewriter to be overhauled soon after she purchased it. It was accepted, as far as one can see, that she had, in fact, done so.

On the submission that the defendant had no foreknowledge that this kind A of damage might flow, we were referred to the judgment of this court, delivered by ASQUITH, L.J., in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (7), and in particular to a passage in the judgment where the Lord Justice said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1002) :

> " What was at that time reasonably foreseeable depends on the knowledge B then possessed by the parties, or, at all events, by the party who later commits the breach. For this purpose, knowledge ' possessed ' is of two kinds—one imputed, the other actual. Everyone, as a reasonable person, is taken to know the ' ordinary course of things ' and consequently what loss is liable to result from a breach of that ordinary course."

In the present case the learned county court judge found that the plaintiff C " behaved in a common-sense way," that she did " the ordinary and natural thing," that what she did was " quite naturally " done, and that it was " right and proper." In those circumstances that which followed flowed directly and naturally from the breach. It resulted "in the ordinary course of events." Damages have to be assessed under s. 53 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and those damages, resulting from the breach of warranty on the part of the seller, would D have been, if there had been no payment on account, the total amount of £20 which the plaintiff paid for the typewriter and the amount which she " rightly " and " properly " and " naturally " expended to have it overhauled and put in proper order. The learned county court judge, in my view, approached this matter from the wrong angle. He ought to have held that the plaintiff was entitled to the sum of £11 10*s*., which was the balance remaining due. The E judgment should be set aside and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

EVERSHED, L.J. : With all respect to the argument of counsel for the defendant, I think it is impossible to hold that the plaintiff here was confined to such remedy as she might have had as on a breach of condition. I add nothing on that point to what has already fallen from SINGLETON, L.J., and it F follows that she was entitled to sue, as she does sue, for breach of warranty. If that be so, then there can be only two questions : (i) Was the warranty broken ? (ii) If so, what were the damages that flowed from it ? It is, I think, not really in dispute that the warranty, whether for title or quiet possession, was broken, but, as regards the damages, the argument has been put that it is not established in fact that the work done to the typewriter was done at a time G which relates it sufficiently to the transaction of purchase and sale which is the contract in question. Nay, further, counsel for the defendant says that the language of the learned judge, namely, that the amount spent by the plaintiff (quite naturally) is not a loss due to the fact that the defendant had sold an article he should not have sold, constitutes a finding of fact negativing the application to the sale in question of s. 53 (2) of the Act. In my judgment, that is a mis-H reading of the effect of the judgment, or, alternatively, if it is not, it involves a misdirection by the judge of himself. When the judge found, as he did, that what the plaintiff had done was the " ordinary and natural thing," it seems to me almost inevitably to follow that the amount spent in doing " the ordinary and natural thing " was something covered by s. 53 (2), and, consequently, I read it clearly as indicating that what she did was done more or less immediately after and certainly as an immediate consequence of the purchase of the typewriter in order to make it usable by her for typing.

I venture to think that where the learned judge went into error was at this point. The argument appears to have been put that, on an action brought in tort by the true owner of the property against the possessor, the possessor would have been entitled to claim against the true owner anything she had spent which increased the value, however and by whatever means that increased value had been arrived at. The learned judge felt that, if the plaintiff succeeded in this action in contract, it would involve that she would be entitled to recover anything she had spent, whether " naturally " or " in the ordinary course of events," or not, in improving the value of the property. In my judgment, there was no analogy between the two cases, and, that being so, the logic, as it seems to me, with all respect to the learned judge's judgment, broke down, and, having found that what she did was " ordinary and natural " he should have then concluded that the cost of doing it fell within s. 53 (2). For these reasons I think that the appeal must succeed.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : I am of the same opinion. There is only one matter on which I think I might usefully add a word and that is the argument of counsel for the defendant as to what is called, not quite correctly, the warranty for quiet enjoyment. The warranty is : " An implied warranty that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods." Counsel for the defendant, at one stage of his argument, said that in that sentence there should be implied an exception in the case of disturbance by title paramount, and, of course, it is familiar learning that, in the case of the ordinary covenants for title on a sale of land, the covenant for quiet enjoyment does not extend to cover disturbance by title paramount. In the case of land, the ordinary implied covenants under the Law of Property Act, 1925, merely reproduced what had been the practice of conveyancers for generations in inserting their covenants in conveyances. It is to be observed that in those covenants the wording is as follows (I am quoting from the Law of Property Act, 1925, sched. II, pt. I). A covenant for quiet enjoyment begins as follows :

> " . . . that, notwithstanding anything as aforesaid, that subject-matter shall remain to and be quietly entered upon, received, and held, occupied, enjoyed, and taken . . ."

Now, " notwithstanding anything as aforesaid " refers back to these words :

> " . . . notwithstanding anything by the person who so conveys or anyone through whom he derives title otherwise than by purchase for value, made, done, executed, or omitted, or knowingly suffered, the person who so conveys has, with the concurrence of every other person, if any, conveying by his direction, full power to convey . . ."

That, on the face of it, limits the covenant for quiet enjoyment to the case of the person conveying and does not cover the case of eviction by title paramount. The covenant for quiet enjoyment goes on as follows :

> " . . . and the benefit thereof shall be received and taken accordingly, without any lawful interruption or disturbance by the person who so conveys or any person conveying by his direction . . ."

Those words are quite clearly sufficient to exclude, as they do exclude, disturbance by title paramount. It is to be observed that in the language used in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 12 (2), there is no exception for any disturbance by title paramount. The words are as I have quoted them. " that the buyer shall have and enjoy quiet possession of the goods." I invited counsel for the defendant to refer us to any authority that would justify the insertion into that statutory phrase of an exception in the case of disturbance by title paramount, but he was unable to do so, and, in the absence of any authority, I can only express my opinion that the statute means what it says and is not to have any such gloss put on it. The order will be that the appeal will be allowed with costs, and judgment will be for the plaintiff for £11 10*s.*, with costs on Scale "B."

Appeal allowed, with costs in both courts. Costs already paid by plaintiff to defendant to be repaid.

C Desertion—Constructive desertion—Conduct equivalent to expulsion of other spouse—Conduct falling short of cruelty.

The parties were married in 1921, and in 1930 the wife left the husband. In 1948, the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground that the wife had deserted him without just cause. The wife, in her answer, alleged cruelty, in that the husband had struck her on many occasions, inflicting severe pain and causing her to be in fear, and that her husband had often D associated with other women, causing the wife anxiety and distress. The learned commissioner was not satisfied that the wife had made out a case of cruelty against the husband, but he found that the conduct of the husband was such as to justify the wife in leaving him. On appeal against this finding:

E HELD: (i) conduct which falls short of legal cruelty may justify one spouse in leaving another, provided it is of a grave and convincing character.

APPEAL by the husband from a judgment of MR. COMMISSIONER GRAZEBROOK, K.C., dated Jan. 20, 1949, dismissing the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion.

The parties were married in 1921. There were no children of the marriage. During 1928 and 1929 the wife went away from the husband for varying periods and in October, 1930, she finally left him. A few months later a Mrs. Jacques and her children went to live in the husband's house and the husband admitted having committed adultery with her on two occasions. On March 5, 1948, the husband filed his petition for divorce alleging desertion without cause since 1930. In her answer the wife alleged cruelty, both physical and mental, in that he had struck her on many occasions and that between 1923 and 1930 he had been associating with other women, in particular, Mrs. Jacques, causing her (the wife) anxiety and distress. She further pleaded that, if she had deserted the husband in 1930, that desertion had been terminated in 1931 when the husband on two occasions had sexual intercourse with her, but she alleged desertion by the husband from 1932 and prayed for a judicial separation. The commissioner, in dismissing the husband's petition, held that there were grounds justifying the wife in leaving him, but he also rejected the prayer in the wife's petition. From the latter decision there was no appeal. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the husband's appeal.

Silkin for the husband.
J. W. Reader Harris for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the husband from a judgment of Mr. Commissioner Grazebrook, K.C., whereby he dismissed the husband's petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground that his wife had deserted him. In her answer the wife prayed for a judicial separation on the grounds of her husband's cruelty and desertion, but the learned commissioner rejected that prayer also, and there is no appeal by the wife from that decision. Therefore, the only question before us is whether the commissioner was wrong in dismissing the husband's petition for desertion.

[His Lordship recited the facts and continued :] The husband's petition, dated Mar. 5, 1948, alleged desertion by the wife without cause—I emphasise those words—for more than three years before the presentation of the petition, namely, since 1930. In her answer the wife alleged, first, physical cruelty in that the husband struck her on many occasions, inflicting severe pain on her and causing her to be in fear, and, then, that from 1923 to September, 1930, he often associated with other women, and, in particular, with a woman known to the wife only as Mrs. Jacques, causing her much anxiety and distress. She goes on to plead : " . . . if the respondent [the wife] did desert the petitioner in 1930, which is denied, the said desertion was terminated in 1931 when the petitioner on two occasions had sexual intercourse with the respondent " at a place where she was then living. She then goes on to allege desertion from 1932, that is, after the occasions when they had intercourse, and she prayed for a judicial separation.

The first and main issue, so far as this appeal is concerned, is : Was the commissioner wrong in deciding that the husband had not made out his case of desertion ? The learned commissioner said as to that :

> " Then comes the question of the wife leaving her husband which is on a somewhat different footing because in regard to that it would not be necessary for her to have to prove cruelty. It would be necessary for her to prove some course of conduct which justified her in leaving her husband. There again I am satisfied that she did leave her husband by reason of some treatment of his, and I am satisfied to that extent that she was justified in leaving him ; but subsequent events to a great extent wipe out any matter of complaint that she had at that time because I am satisfied also in regard to the subsequent period that the wife's story is nearer the truth than the husband's in regard to subsequent events."

On that counsel for the husband has put forward three points. The first is a point of law—that in view of the judgment of Hodson, J., in Barker v. Barker (1) it was not open to the commissioner to find that the wife was justified in leaving her husband once he (the commissioner) had decided that the case of cruelty alleged by the wife had not been made out. The second point was that, on the facts, the commissioner was wrong in holding that there were sufficient grounds to justify the wife's leaving. The third point was that the commissioner's judgment was illogical because, if there were sufficient grounds for the wife to leave the husband, the husband himself was a constructive deserter and, that being so, the wife ought to have succeeded in her plea for a judicial separation on the ground of the husband's desertion.

As regards the first point, it is well to look at three cases before I come to the judgment of Hodson, J. The first is Russell v. Russell (2), which is referred to in the judgment of Hodson, J. In that case the wife petitioned for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights on the ground that the husband had left her. In his answer he pleaded that he had good grounds for leaving her in that she made an unfounded charge of an unnatural offence committed by him. In his answer he also asked for a decree of separation on the ground of her cruelty. In the result, both petition and answer failed. The husband failed in his plea for a judicial separation on the ground of his wife's cruelty because he failed to establish that her conduct had injured his health or was likely to injure it. She failed in her claim for restitution of conjugal rights because it was held that her conduct was such as to justify him in living away from her. Lopes, L.J., in giving a judgment on this part of the case (with which Rigby, L.J., agreed), said ([1895] P. 334) :

> " By s. 16 of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 desertion is for the first time made a ground for judicial separation, and is not governed by the old ecclesiastical law ; but it is no ground for a sentence of judicial separation unless the desertion is without cause. If the wife were petitioning for a judicial separation here on the ground of desertion against her husband, her conduct towards him would disable her from contending that the desertion was without cause, and she would fail in her suit."

It is plain that the Lord Justice is saying in effect that the husband had failed to make out a case of cruelty against the wife, but, nevertheless, her conduct towards him prevented her from contending that the desertion was without cause. In other words, one can have cause for desertion which falls short of legal cruelty.

The second case is Oldroyd v. Oldroyd (3), decided by Gorell Barnes, J., in 1896, before Russell v. Russell (2) reached the House of Lords. Gorell Barnes, J., says ([1896] P. 184) :

> " The effect of that case [Russell v. Russell (2)] appears to be that in cases where the conduct of the petitioner has led to desertion by the respondent, and has amounted to sufficient cause to disentitle the petitioner to maintain a suit for judicial separation on the ground of desertion, the court is now empowered to refuse to pronounce a decree compelling the respondent to return to cohabitation with the petitioner. The truth is that in such cases it has become practically impossible for the spouses to live properly together."

The third case is Buchler v. Buchler (4). There the question arose as to what conduct on the part of a husband justified a wife in refusing to live with him and then setting up a plea of constructive desertion. Lord Greene, M.R., said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 321) :

> " The crucial matter for consideration, therefore, is the nature of the conduct relied on as equivalent to an expulsion of the complaining spouse. It must, I think, be accepted that the acts sufficient to satisfy this test must be of a serious and convincing nature. Counsel for the husband submitted > that nothing short of a matrimonial offence such as cruelty or adultery would suffice, and he pointed out that, even in the case of adultery, some more flagrant conduct beyond the mere commission of adultery had always been present in the reported cases, but he eventually found himself compelled to agree that conduct short of an actual matrimonial offence might be sufficient. In this I agree with him, but the necessary conduct must, from the very nature of the offence of desertion, obviously be of a grave and convincing character. Whether in any given case this requirement is fulfilled is a question of fact on which a jury would require to be carefully directed. It would be for the judge to say whether the facts were capable of being regarded as equivalent to an expulsion from the matrimonial home."

On the same point, Asquith, L.J., said (ibid., 326) :

> " Constructively the deserter may be the party who remains behind, if that party has been guilty of conduct which justifies the other party in leaving. Secondly, to afford such justification the conduct of the party staying on need not have amounted to a matrimonial offence, such as cruelty or adultery. But, thirdly, it must exceed in gravity such behaviour, vexatious and trying though it may be, as every spouse bargains to endure when accepting the other 'for better or worse.' The ordinary wear and tear of conjugal life does not in itself suffice. Where the judge seems to have erred is in supposing that on the evidence before him conduct complying with this last test had been established . . . This would appear to be a question of law, involving, as it does, the issue whether there was any or no evidence to support the judge's conclusion. But between the extremes indicated there is obviously a no-man's land where the issue is one of fact. This does not debar an appellate tribunal from disturbing the judge's findings if, in the view of that tribunal, they are plainly wrong."

That case was decided before Barker v. Barker (1), which came before the court in December, 1948. Buchler v. Buchler (4) may not have appeared in the Reports, and, apparently, it was not cited in Barker v. Barker (1), but the decision of the House of Lords in Russell v. Russell (2) was referred to. In Barker v. Barker (1) an appeal came to the Divisional Court from a decision of justices finding that a husband had been guilty of persistent cruelty and of wilful neglect to maintain. Lord Merriman, P., in the course of his judgment said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 248) :

> " There was also, as I have said, included in the summons a charge of wilful neglect to maintain. The justices have not dealt specifically with that in their reasons, but, apparently, the order was based on both grounds. A question has arisen whether it is possible to separate these two grounds, so that, even if the wife does not succeed on the charge of persistent cruelty, she may, nevertheless, succeed on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain. I think that on the facts of this case no such distinction falls to be drawn and the case stands or falls as a whole on the finding of persistent cruelty, and so I propose to deal with it on that basis."

The learned President decided that there was no evidence of cruelty in that there was not a shred of evidence that the wife had suffered injury or reasonable apprehension of injury, and he allowed the appeal. He said nothing at all, except what I have read, on the alternative charge of wilful neglect to maintain. Hodson, J., at the end of his judgment said (ibid., 250) :

> " On the other branch of this case, namely, wilful neglect to maintain, counsel for the wife argued that something less than cruelty would justify a wife remaining apart from her husband. I think that is an unsound proposition. It will not do to say that because a grave and weighty matter will justify one spouse in leaving the other, therefore something less than cruelty will do, The grave and weighty matter which justifies one spouse in leaving the other is very often something different from cruelty, something which may even be regarded as more calculated to disrupt family life, such as the persistence in a false allegation of a criminal charge which was the subject of the decision in Russell v. Russell (2). Many people might regard this as something worse than cruelty involving the mere infliction of a physical injury causing injury to health. The existence of cruelty A depends not on the magnitude but rather on the consequence of the offence, actual or apprehended, and, dealing with conduct which is either cruelty or not cruelty, it is, in my view, not open to any court to say : 'This is not cruelty, but it is so near it that it amounts to a grave and weighty matter justifying separation.' There being, in my opinion, no other matter apart from persistent cruelty which justifies the wife in remaining B away from her husband in this case so as to put her in a position to claim separate maintenance, that ground of the order also fails, and the husband's appeal should succeed."

Counsel for the husband says that is his case, and that in the present case, the commissioner having found that the husband was not cruel, there was no C justification for the wife leaving. If HODSON, J., meant to say that, once a charge of cruelty has failed to be established, it is impossible for a wife to establish grounds justifying her in refusing to live with her husband, with great respect to the learned judge, it seems to me that that decision is inconsistent with the judgments in Russell v. Russell (2) and Buchler v. Buchler (4) which this court ought to follow. I myself think that that is not what the judge D meant to say. I think he meant to say in effect : "Here is a case where the blows inflicted by the husband on the wife either amounted to cruelty in that they injured her health, or were likely to injure it, or they were not of such a nature. If they were not of such a nature then, there being no other evidence in the case to justify desertion, the court ought not to say : 'Although they were, in effect, trivial blows, they justify her in leaving the husband'." If E that is the view which the learned judge was taking, I do not think there is anything in his judgment inconsistent with the judgments to which I have referred. Therefore, I think that the point of law which counsel has raised fails.

[HIS LORDSHIP held that there was evidence on which the commissioner could find that the wife was justified in leaving the matrimonial home, but that F he was entitled to exercise his discretion in refusing the wife a decree, and said that the appeal must be dismissed.]

COHEN, L.J. : I agree that the appeal fails.

YACHUK AND ANOTHER v. OLIVER BLAIS CO., LTD.

[Privy Council (Viscount Simon, Lord Porter, Lord du Parcq and Lord MacDermott), March 3, 7, 8, 9, April 11, 1949.]

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Novus actus interveniens—Child procuring petrol by untruth—Injury by explosion of ignited petrol—Liability of seller.

By an untrue statement a boy aged nine years, who was accompanied by his brother aged seven, prevailed on an employee of the defendant company to sell him a small quantity of petrol. The evidence indicated that the employee had doubts as to the propriety of the sale, for, before the two children were beyond recall, he told the assistant-manager about it and asked him to confirm that he had acted rightly. The children wanted the petrol for use in a game in which they enacted a Red Indian scene they had witnessed in a cinematograph theatre. In the result, the boy was seriously burned. The defendants contended that the real cause of the boy's injuries were his subsequent acts which constituted novus actus interveniens, or, alternatively, that he had been guilty of contributory negligence. All the Canadian courts in which the case was heard found that on the part of the employee who sold the petrol there had been negligence which had contributed to the boy's injuries.

Held : (i) in view of the fact that the boy's story was such as to arouse rather than to allay suspicion in the mind of a reasonable man, the fact that he told a lie to obtain the petrol could not avail the defendants.

(ii) the defendants' employee having given an explosive substance to a boy who had limited knowledge of the likelihood of an explosion and its possible effect and the boy having done that which a child of his age might be expected to do, the defendants could not avail themselves of the defence of contributory negligence.

Principle stated by Lord Denman, C.J., in Lynch v. Nurdin (1841) (1 Q.B. 38), applied.

(iii) in the light of the concurrent findings of fact of the Canadian courts (which it would be contrary to practice to reject, notwithstanding that the decision of one court was not unanimous) that the employee's negligence contributed to cause the injuries suffered by the boy, it was impossible to say that a new cause had intervened so as to relieve the defendant from all responsibility for the evil consequences which followed his wrongful act.

Consolidated Appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Supreme Court restored the judgment of the trial judge awarding the plaintiffs damages but reducing them because of the infant plaintiff's contributory negligence. The plaintiffs appealed against the finding of contributory negligence and the defendant company against the finding of negligence. The Judicial Committee allowed the plaintiffs' appeal and dismissed the cross-appeal of the defendant company, which was ordered to pay the plaintiffs' costs of the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and of the appeal and cross-appeal to the Judicial Committee. The facts appear in the judgment.

Diplock, K.C., and Quintin Hogg for the plaintiffs.

Gahan for the defendant company.

The Board took time for consideration.

April 11. LORD DU PARCQ delivered the following judgment of the Board. William Yachuk, an infant who sued by his father as next friend, and Tony Yachuk (the father suing in his own right) were plaintiffs, and the Oliver Blais Co., Ltd., was defendant, in an action begun in January, 1943, in the Supreme Court of Ontario. Two other defendants who were also sued are no longer concerned in the proceedings, and no further reference need be made to them.

The plaintiffs' claim was for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty. Of the alleged breach of statutory duty all that need now be said is that no argument was addressed to their Lordships in support of that head of the claim. The negligence alleged consisted in supplying the infant plaintiff, then a child of nine years of age, with a small quantity of gasoline, with the result that he suffered injury and his father was put to expense. The first hearing of the action was abortive, as a new trial was ordered on appeal. The case was ultimately tried by Urquhart, J., who, for reasons which are now irrelevant, discharged a jury before whom the hearing had begun and proceeded to hear and determine the case without their assistance. The learned judge found that there was negligence on the part of the defendant company, and that its negligence was a cause of the injuries which the infant plaintiff had sustained. He further found that there was contributory negligence on the part of the infant plaintiff. He assessed the damages at $8,000 in respect of the infant plaintiff and $2,712.75 in respect of the adult plaintiff, but, inasmuch as he regarded the infant plaintiff as "75 per cent. responsible" for his own injuries, he apportioned the damages, as between the defendant company and each of the plaintiffs, in proportion to the degree of negligence so found. It was, therefore, adjudged that the infant plaintiff should recover $2,000 and his father $678.19. The question whether the terms of the Negligence Act (R.S.O. 1937, c. 115) could justify, on any view of the facts, this reduction of the damages awarded to the father does not appear to have been argued before the learned judge. It was answered in the affirmative by two judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. As will appear, no other judge had occasion to pronounce on it, and their Lordships have not found it necessary to consider it.

The plaintiffs appealed, and the defendant cross-appealed, to the Court of Appeal for Ontario. A judgment with which Robertson, C.J. (Ontario), and Roach, J.A., expressed their agreement was delivered by McRuer, J.A. The appeal of the plaintiffs was allowed, the court holding that the defence of contributory negligence failed. The cross-appeal was dismissed. The order of the court was that judgment should be entered for the full amounts at which Urquhart, J., had assessed the damages, without deduction. From this order the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. Of the five judges who heard the appeal two, the Chief Justice of Canada and Kerwin, J., were of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the action dismissed, holding that negligence could not be imputed to the defendant's salesman. The other three (Hudson, Rand and Estey, JJ.) were all agreed that there was negligence on the part of the defendant's salesman, but whereas Hudson and Estey, JJ., thought that the trial judge was right in his finding of contributory negligence, and in reducing the damages accordingly, Rand, J., agreed with the decision of the Court of Appeal for Ontario. In the result an order was made restoring the judgment of Urquhart, J. This result satisfied neither plaintiffs nor defendant, and each side sought and obtained leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council, the defendant by way of cross-appeal.

It is now necessary to set out in a little detail the relevant facts as they were found by the learned judge at the trial. In the afternoon of July 31, 1940, the infant plaintiff, who was accompanied by a younger brother then aged seven, went to the respondent's gasoline station in Kirkland Lake. A youth named Black, who was employed by the respondent, was then serving customers. The boys bought from him five cents' worth of gasoline. It appears that the five cents were paid to Black by the younger boy, but " the transaction " (the learned judge found) " was with the larger boy " who twice told Black that he wanted the gasoline to put in his mother's car which " was stuck down the street." Black, who had been instructed that the gasoline in the pumps contained lead and ought not to be used for dry cleaning, then asked whether it was to be used for dry cleaning. The infant plaintiff replied that it was not and repeated that it was needed for his mother's car. Black repeated his question, and received the same reply. The boys had provided themselves with a lard pail with a closely fitting, but removable, lid and Black, not without " real doubts and misgivings . . . as to the propriety of his sale " (which, in the learned judge's view, were justified) supplied them with about a pint of gasoline, half filling the pail. That Black had doubts was indicated both by his question about dry cleaning and by the fact that before the boys had gone beyond recall he told the assistant-manager about the sale, and said : " That's all right, isn't it ? " The learned judge attached importance to the fact that the gasoline was not supplied in a " safety container," but in a receptacle which he found to be unsafe.

The story which the infant plaintiff told to Black was untrue. The boys' mother was, in fact, ill in bed. The five cents had been provided by her for the purchase of a confection known as chocolate milk. The boys wanted the gasoline in order to make use of it in a game in which they proposed to play the part of Red Indians, and to enact a scene which they had witnessed in a moving picture. For this purpose torches were required, and it had occurred to them that by soaking in gasoline some bulrushes which they had gathered and setting them alight with matches, satisfactory torches might be made. They had failed to obtain the necessary gasoline from another station in the neighbourhood, where it had been refused at first because they brought with them a glass container, and later, when they arrived with the lard pail, because (the learned judge thought) " they told a different story on this occasion." It was after the latter rebuff that they visited the defendant's station and were successful. The sequel may be told in the learned judge's own words ([1944] 3 D.L.R. 620) :

> " The boys took the pail of gasoline with which they started out in the general direction in which they had indicated that their mother's car was stranded. Then they went to a lane, out of sight of the gas station and some distance away from it. The infant plaintiff then sent his brother to the house for the bulrushes and some matches, and, when the brother returned, the infant plaintiff dipped one of the bulrushes in the pail of gasoline and handed the dripping bulrush to the smaller brother and then lighted it. The bulrush in the brother's hand flared up and he, being frightened, tried to beat it out on the ground. At that time, the boys were standing about four feet apart with the pail of gasoline open, midway between them. The gasoline in the pail, the boys say, caught fire from the bulrush with a swishing sound, although they say that when the bulrush was beaten on the ground there were no sparks."

The unhappy result was that " the infant plaintiff was most painfully and seriously burned."

On these facts the learned judge found " that under all the circumstances of the case, Black should have reasonably anticipated that the gasoline might be used for a dangerous purpose by these two young lads " and held that his negligence contributed to cause the injuries which the infant plaintiff suffered. As appears from the summary of the proceedings at the beginning of this judgment, all the courts in Canada have concurred in these findings, although the Court of Appeal for Ontario went further, holding that contributory negligence could not be imputed to the infant plaintiff and that his injuries must be attributed solely to the negligence of the defendant. It would be contrary to the well known rule of practice by which their Lordships are guided to reject these concurrent findings of fact. In their Lordships' opinion it is hopeless to contend that there was not evidence to support the findings. Not all the reasons given for them by the learned judge seem to their Lordships to be equally convincing, but the evidence, taken as a whole, in their view fully substantiates the conclusion at which both the judge and the two appellate courts in Canada arrived on these matters. The rule as to concurrent findings is none the less applicable when the decision of a court is not unanimous : see Robins v. National Trust Co. (1); Srimati Bibhabati Devi v. Kumar Ramendra Narayan Roy (2).

It was contended on behalf of the defendant at their Lordships' Bar, as it had been, without success, at the trial, that, assuming its employee to have been negligent, the subsequent acts of the infant plaintiff were the real cause of his injuries, and were an intervening cause, or novus actus interveniens, to which alone those injuries should be ascribed. Alternatively, the defendant relied on the finding of the learned judge, supported as it was by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, that there was contributory negligence on the part of the infant plaintiff. The latter of these submissions accords with the judgment under appeal, and it is convenient to deal with it at once. The negligence of the defendant consisted in putting into the hands of a small boy a dangerous substance with which a reasonable man, taking thought, would have foreseen that the child was likely to do himself an injury. The fact that the boy told an untruth in order to persuade Black to give him the gasoline, a fact on which the defendant's counsel much relied, cannot avail the defendant in view of the learned judge's finding that Black's doubts as to the propriety of the sale were justified. To put a highly inflammable substance into the hands of a small boy is to subject him to temptation and the risk of injury and this is no less true if the boy has resorted to deceit in order to overcome the suppliers' scruples. The child's deceit can afford no excuse to the supplier when it is found that the story told was such as to arouse, rather than allay, suspicion in the mind of a reasonable man. In the circumstances, therefore, their Lordships think that McRuer, J.A., was right in applying to this case the principle stated by Lord Denman, C.J., in Lynch v. Nurdin (3) (1 Q.B. 38) :

> " The most blameable carelessness of his servant having tempted the child, he [the defendant] ought not to reproach the child with yielding to that temptation. He has been the real and only cause of the mischief. He has been deficient in ordinary care ; the child, acting without prudence or thought, has, however, shown these qualities in as great a degree as he could be expected to possess them. His misconduct bears no proportion to that of the defendant which produced it."

The negligence of the defendant's servant in the present case may call for less severe condemnation than these words express, but the principle which they embody is none the less applicable.

Urquhart, J., was led to his finding of contributory negligence by the view which he formed as to the special characteristics of the infant plaintiff. He found that the boy was " mentally alert " and " bright," and said of him ([1944] 3 D.L.R. 620) :

> " He would be quite capable of being guilty of contributory negligence in the abstract and also in respect of the handling of gasoline and gasoline > fires. He knew the dangers of matches. His father had gasoline in his workshop which was attached to the house. The [infant] plaintiff admitted that he had before the occurrence watched gasoline in his father's torch and had been with his father on a job or two, had seen his father lighting his torch and knew that there was gasoline in it, and had been told by his father to keep away from the torch. His father would not allow the children into the workshop [in which he worked as a plumber]. I have no doubt that the boy fully appreciated that gasoline was a dangerous substance, and had considerable knowledge that it burned in no ordinary manner."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the learned judge's findings were illogical and inconsistent. Black was negligent because he ought to have recognised that a boy of the age of the infant plaintiff not only lacked knowledge and experience, but was likely to have mischievous propensities. These defects being characteristic of the normal boy, it was impossible (so ran the argument) to impute to this boy, whatever exceptional training or experience he might have had and however reckless he might appear to have been, any failure to take reasonable care for his own safety. In other words, he could not be found guilty of contributory negligence. Their Lordships do not find it necessary to decide whether there is a necessary inconsistency, in all cases in which the defendant owes a duty to show special care in his dealings with a child, in a finding of negligence by the defendant coupled with one of contributory negligence by an infant plaintiff. If the evidence had shown that the infant plaintiff in the present case had, in fact, greater knowledge of the dangerous properties of gasoline than would be imputed normally to a child of his age, a more debatable question would have arisen. A careful examination of the evidence has satisfied their Lordships that the boy had no knowledge of the peculiarly dangerous quality of gasoline. He knew, no doubt, that an object soaked in gasoline could be ignited with a match. He did not know, and there is no evidence that he had ever been told, that gasoline was a volatile liquid capable of producing a highly inflammable vapour likely to burst into flame if heat were brought near it. He knew (he said in his evidence) that "it would burn like a match . . . after you strike it." His father said that he had never warned him about gasoline, because he did not think that a boy could buy it. The boy himself said, what is likely enough, that his father had told him to keep away from his gasoline torch, but that he was "pretty sure" that neither of his parents had ever warned him "to be careful with gasoline." On the evidence it is, in their Lordships' view, impossible to regard him as any more capable of taking care of himself in the circumstances in which he was placed than a normal boy of his age might be expected to be. In the words of Denman, C.J., although he may be said to have acted "without prudence or thought", he "showed these qualities in as great a degree as he could be expected to possess them." It is a fair inference from the evidence that it was the very property of gasoline which he neither knew, nor could be expected to know, which brought about his misadventure. Their Lordships are, accordingly, of opinion, in agreement with the Court of Appeal for Ontario, that on the facts of this case the finding of contributory negligence cannot be supported.

It follows from what their Lordships have already said that the attempt to attribute the disaster which happened solely to the acts of the infant plaintiff must fail. That defence cannot, indeed, be maintained in the light of the concurrent findings of fact in this case, for, when once the negligence of the defendant's servant has been found to have contributed to cause damage to the plaintiff, it is impossible to say that a new cause has intervened so as to relieve the defendant of all responsibility for the evil consequences which followed his wrongful act. Their Lordships will add, however, that even without regard to the rule of practice as to concurrent findings they would have had no difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion. However the case is put, the answer made by McRUER, J.A., in the Court of Appeal for Ontario, seems to their Lordships to be conclusive in the light of the evidence when he said ([1945] Ont. Rep. 33) :

> " If one gives to a child an explosive substance and the child, with a limited knowledge in respect of the likely effect of the explosion, is tempted to meddle with it to his injury, it cannot be said in answer to a claim on A behalf of the child that he did meddle to his own injury, or that he was tempted to do that which a child of his years might be reasonably expected to do."

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the plaintiffs' appeal should be allowed, the judgment and order of the Supreme Court of Canada B set aside, the judgment and order of the Court of Appeal for Ontario of Dec. 19, 1944, restored, and the cross-appeal of the defendant dismissed. The defendant must pay the plaintiffs' costs of the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and of the appeal and cross-appeal to His Majesty in Council.

Appeal allowed. Cross-appeal dismissed.

SEAFORD COURT ESTATES, LTD. v. ASHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), May 2, 3, June 1, 1949.]

E Rent Restriction—Permitted increase—Transfer of burden—Covenant by landlord to provide services previously supplied voluntarily—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (3).

By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3) : " . . . any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is F held are on the whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act."

By a lease dated Sept. 22, 1943, a flat which was subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts was let at a rent of £250 a year, the landlords covenanting inter alia to remove refuse and to provide hot water. From 1935 to 1939, G the flat had been let at a rent of £175 a year, but the lease of 1935 contained no covenants to be performed by the landlords save that of paying rates and taxes, although the landlords had, in fact, provided the extra services which they later covenanted to provide by the lease of 1943. In proceedings by the landlords to recover arrears of rent, the tenant contended that the landlords were not entitled to claim more than the standard rent of the H flat, viz., the £175 a year. The landlords contended that their additional obligations under the lease of 1943 constituted the transfer to them of a " burden " previously borne by the tenant, within the meaning of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920, so that they were entitled to increase the rent.

HELD : (i) the word " terms " in s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 meant contractual terms, viz., legal rights or obligations, and not mere de facto advantages or handicaps, and, therefore, in determining whether or not there had been a transfer to the landlords of a burden previously borne by the tenant within the meaning of the sub-section, the circumstance that before 1943 the landlords had voluntarily provided the services in question should not be taken into account, but, as the landlords could at any moment have ceased to provide the services, there was a contingent burden on the tenant to provide them himself or do without them, and, therefore, as the addition of the word "burden" in the phrase "burden or liability" in s. 2 (3) implied that something less than the transfer of a A strict legal obligation would meet the requirements of the sub-section, by the terms of the lease of 1943 the tenant was freed from a disadvantage which, in view of, e.g., the rising cost of fuel, could be described as a "burden" within the meaning of s. 2 (3), and there was a transfer to the landlords of a burden previously borne by the tenant within the meaning of the sub-section and the terms on which the flat was held were on the B whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms.

(ii) notwithstanding that the landlords had not consciously related the increase of rent and the burden, the words "in respect of" the transfer in s. 2 (3) of the Act were satisfied provided that there was an increase of rent C not greater than was commensurate with the quantum of the burden transferred and substantially contemporary with its transfer, and, therefore, the landlords were entitled to increase the rent under the sub-section, but, as the amount of the increase had not been expressly agreed between the parties, it was for the court to assess the value of the services to be provided and translate it in terms of rent. Appeal by the landlords and cross-appeal by the tenant from an order of His Honour Judge Dale, at Bloomsbury County Court, dated Dec. 14, 1948.

By a lease dated Sept. 22, 1943, the landlords let a flat to the tenant at a rent of £250 a year payable quarterly in advance. In proceedings by the landlords to recover £62 10*s*., being one quarter's rent payable on June 24, 1948, G the tenant contended that the landlords were only entitled to rent at the rate of £175 a year, which was the standard rent of the flat, and he counterclaimed for the excess rent paid for the eleven quarters previous to June 24, 1948. The landlords contended that by the lease of 1943 there was a transfer to them of a burden previously borne by the tenant, within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), and, therefore, H they were entitled to the extra rent. The county court judge held that the landlords were entitled to rent only at the rate of £175 a year, and that the tenant was entitled to recover excess rent paid in respect of six quarters. On the appeal and cross-appeal from this decision, the Court of Appeal now held that the increase of rent was permitted under s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 and allowed the landlords' appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Asquith, L.J.

C. L. Henderson, K.C., James MacMillan and Norman Richards for the landlords.

John Stephenson for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1. The following judgments were read.

LORD GREENE: The relevant facts are stated in the judgments of A ASQUITH and DENNING, L.JJ., which I have had the advantage of reading. I agree with their conclusions and the reasoning on which they are based, and have only a few words of my own to add. I may say, however, that the true interpretation of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3), is a matter which appears to me to be left by the authorities in some obscurity and might well be the subject of consideration by the highest B tribunal.

The present question arises under the second limb of the sub-section, which deals with the case where there has been an increase of rent. In order to ascertain whether what is de facto an increase of rent ought, for the purposes of the Act, to be deemed not to be an increase of rent, we are required to compare the "terms" on which the dwelling-house was held previously to the de facto C increase of rent with the "terms" on which it is held subsequently to that increase. The meaning of the word "terms" in this context is not, in my opinion, open to doubt. It bears the ordinary meaning of that word when found in a lease, i.e., the provisions of the lease which are binding in law. For the purpose of this comparison we are required to ascertain whether (i) the de facto increase of rent is in respect of a transfer to the landlord of a burden D or liability previously borne by the tenant, and (ii) whether the result of such transfer is to make the new terms not less favourable than the previous terms. This must, as it seems to me, involve a weighing of the "terms" in the new lease, one of which (the increase of rent) is detrimental, and the other of which (the assumption of a transferred burden or liability by the landlord) is beneficial to the tenant, and for the purpose of that operation I should have thought E that it is not permissible to go outside the "terms" and consider the effect of something which cannot properly be described as a term—in other words, the transfer of the burden or liability must be something which of itself operates to make a change in the "terms" of the lease capable of being weighed against the other relevant "term," i.e., the increase in the rent.

In the present case there came into existence in the new lease a "term" F which was absent from the previous lease, viz., the contractual liability of the landlords to provide the services in question, and for the reasons given by ASQUITH, L.J., the increase of rent, or, at any rate, an appropriate amount of it, must, I think, be taken as having been made "in respect" of that assumption of liability. In the circumstances, can it be said that there has been a "transfer" to the landlords of a "burden or liability previously borne by the G tenant"? There was, admittedly, no transfer of a "liability," since that word, in my opinion, means a legal liability enforceable by the landlords, or by a third party, e.g., a local authority. The word "burden" is, however, in my judgment, apt to describe the position of the tenant. That word must, I should have thought, at any rate include a thing which the tenant as such reasonably desires to have provided for his benefit and for the provision of H which he has no legal right of recourse against anyone else, his landlord or a third party. In the present case the services in question were reasonably desired by the tenant, and he had no such right of recourse. If he wanted them, the burden, so far as his legal position was concerned, lay on his own shoulders, and the assumption of liability by the landlords relieved him of that burden. It is suggested, however, that we should take into account the circumstance that during the currency of the old lease the landlords were voluntarily providing the services. But there was no "term" in the old lease that they should do so, and for the purposes of the required comparison of " terms " I do not myself see how it is possible to introduce something which operated in fact but cannot in any way be regarded as a " term." I do not myself think that this conclusion is inconsistent with any decision by which we are bound. If, however, I am wrong in this, I am prepared to accept the views expressed by ASQUITH, L.J., in relation to that topic. The order will be as mentioned by ASQUITH, L.J. A ASQUITH, L.J. : This is an appeal by the landlords and cross-appeal by the tenant from a decision of His Honour JUDGE DALE in the Bloomsbury County Court, whereby he adjudged that the landlords were entitled to succeed against the tenant to the extent of £43 15*s*. on a claim for one quarter's rent of a flat in Great Portland Street, and that the tenant's counterclaim in respect of rent overpaid in the past was entitled to succeed to the extent of £112 10*s*. B He, accordingly, gave judgment for the tenant for a balance of £68 odd. The flat in question was let by the landlords to the tenant by a lease of Sept. 22, 1943, at a rent of £250 per annum payable quarterly in advance. The landlords claimed £62 10*s*., being one quarter's rent at that annual rate payable on June 24, 1948, for the quarter beginning on that day. The tenant, who had been paying for a considerable time on that basis, set up that the landlords were C not entitled to claim more than the standard rent, which he alleged (and it is now agreed) was £175 per annum. At that annual rate the proper quarterly rent would be £43 15*s*., £18 15*s*. less than £62 10*s*., the quarterly rent claimed on £250 per annum. The tenant, accordingly, contended (i) that the landlords' claim for the quarter's rent should be reduced from £62 10*s*. to £43 15*s*. ; (ii) that he was entitled to counterclaim for each of eleven quarters previous to D June 24, 1948, an over-payment of £18 15*s*., making £206 5*s*. in all. The learned judge found the standard rent of the flat was £175 per annum, awarded the landlords £43 15*s*. for one quarter's rent on this basis, and sustained the counterclaim for repayment of £18 15*s*. quarterly, not for eleven quarters as claimed, but for six quarters only, on which footing, as stated, it totalled £112 10*s*., and £68 odd was due on balance to the tenant. Against this result the E landlords appealed and the tenant cross-appealed. The ground of the landlords' appeal was that they were entitled to charge rent at £250 per annum—£75 more than the standard rent—by reason of the provisions of s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920, so far as that sub-section relates to transfers of burdens or liabilities from a tenant to a landlord. The grounds of the cross-appeal by the tenant were that the county court judge should have held that the £18 15*s*. repayment F per quarter was due not in respect of six quarters only, but of a longer period. His notice of cross-appeal argues for this repayment in respect of nine quarters, but the claim as to one of these quarters has been waived by the tenant, and, as to the difference between six and eight quarters, was conceded by the landlords in the course of the argument in this court.

The relevant facts are not in dispute. The flat in question was the property G of the landlords at least as long ago as 1935. By a lease of Sept. 23, 1935, they let it to one Edwards at £175 per annum, and it is conceded (the flat having a rateable value of £62) that it is subject as to rent to the Rent Restrictions Acts, and that this figure of £175 represented the standard rent. The 1935 lease contained no covenants to be performed by the landlords save a single one, to pay rates and taxes. Edwards' term expired on Sept. 29, 1938, but H he held over until December, 1939. The flat was vacant from then until September, 1943. It was then let to the present tenant at a rent of £250. This second lease contained a number of covenants to be performed by the landlords. Inter alia they covenanted to pay certain impositions other than rates and taxes, to repair the exterior of the house, to remove refuse, and (most important of all) to provide hot water, an onerous obligation at a time when the cost of fuel was rising and supplies precarious. The county court judge, however, found that, while the landlords, under their earlier lease to Edwards, had not yet assumed a legal obligation to provide any of these services, de facto and as an act of grace they did during that period provide all of them. This finding is important since the county court judge inferred from it that there had been no "transfer of a burden or liability" to the landlords within s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920, and gave judgment in favour of the tenant on the basis of A this inference.

Section 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 reads as follows:

> "Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which B a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased, whether or not the sum periodically payable by way of rent is increased, and any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is held are on the whole not less favourable C to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act."

While the construction of this provision is obscure and difficult, its broad aim is plain. First, a tenant who pays an unreduced money rent (viz., the standard rent plus permitted increases, if any) must not get less for it. If he does, the rent is to be treated as reduced. This is the object of the first limb of the D sub-section. Secondly, the object of the second limb is that a landlord who charges an increased rent (more than the standard rent plus permitted increases if any) may not exact the increase unless, and save to the extent that, he gives more for it. Any increase of rent not justified on this basis need not be paid by the tenant, and, if paid, can be recovered back by him. The second limb of the sub-section is the relevant one in this case. The landlords had to E show that the increase of the rent from £175 (the standard rent) to £250 was an increase to which that limb applied and which in consequence of its application was to be "deemed not to be an" (unpermitted) "increase . . . for the purposes of this Act"—in other words, that it was to be deemed to be legally exigible by the landlords, and, if paid by the tenant, irrecoverable by him.

In order to bring the increase of rent within the relevant part of the sub-section F so that it can be "deemed" not to be an unpermitted increase, the landlords must establish four propositions: (i) that "the terms on which [the] dwelling-house is held," though changed, are "not less favourable to the tenant" than they were before the increase of rent; (ii) that the change in the terms is the "result" of a "transfer to [the] landlord of [a] burden or liability"; (iii) that this "burden or liability" was before the transfer "borne by the tenant"; (iv) that the G increase in the rent is an increase "in respect of [the] transfer" in question. I am of opinion, with my Lord, that in the first of these propositions "terms" means contractual terms, viz., legal rights or obligations, not mere de facto advantages or handicaps. When a statute is speaking of the terms on which premises are held by a tenant from a landlord, there is a strong presumption that it means the first.

H Before inquiring, on this assumption, whether the above four propositions are established in relation to the facts of the present case and the provision therefore applies, it may be helpful to proceed by stages and to consider first whether the provision has any, and, if so, what, application on somewhat simpler facts. (a) It clearly does apply (and this is the simplest case) where a legal obligation is transplanted from the back of the tenant to the back of the landlord, provided the increase of rent does no more than compensate the landlord for this transplantation. For, in that case there is a transfer to the landlord of a "liability" previously borne by the tenant, this transfer "results" in new contractual "terms" which (after the increased rent has been allowed for) are "not less favourable to the tenant," and the increased rent is "in respect of" that transfer (a statement which I will try to make good later). (b) At the other end of the scale the provision clearly does not apply where no obligation enters into the picture, e.g., where the landlord voluntarily begins to provide some service for the tenant with which the tenant had until then voluntarily provided himself or gone unprovided, because the provision clearly contemplates only cases in which the (contractual) "terms" are affected, and on the facts assumed they will not have been affected: see First National Housing Trust, Ltd. v. Chesterfield R.D.C. (1). (c) Between these extremes fall cases (of which the present is one example) where the landlord assumes a legal obligation previously not resting on the tenant, or the tenant is relieved of a legal obligation previously resting on him, which is not shifted as an obligation on to the shoulders of the landlord: e.g., the present case, and Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2). In such cases there has clearly been a change in the (contractual) "terms" on which the dwelling-house is held, but does that change "result" from a "transfer to [the] landlord of [a] burden or liability previously borne by the tenant"? In approaching this question some significance must be attributed to the phrase "burden or liability." If "liability" (which suggests a legal obligation stricto sensu) had stood alone, the natural inference would be that there must, to satisfy the provision, never be less than what has been called the transplantation of an obligation as in case (a) above. The addition of the words "burden or" implies that something less or something looser than such a transplantation will suffice, and two cases decided directly under s. 2 (3) both bear out this view. One appears to say that the "something less" is enough; the other that the something less is essential and (possibly) that something more is necessary.

These two cases are Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2), and Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark (3). In neither of them did the landlord, as in the present case, assume an obligation; in each case a party was released from one. In Miller's case (2) the tenant, who had previously been saddled with a full repairing covenant, was later released from that part of the obligation which covered "fair wear and tear." In Clark's case (3) the landlord, who had previously been under an obligation (a) to provide certain cooking and heating facilities, and (b) to do certain other things (e.g., clean the common stair), was later released from these obligations. Clark's case (3), therefore, was one within the first limb of s. 2 (3) which treats of "transfer . . . of [a] burden" from the landlord to the tenant, but is none the less relevant for that when the question is what is meant by "transfer . . . of [a] burden," for presumably this phrase bears the same meaning in the second limb as in the first. In neither case did the obligation which one party had shaken off alight as an obligation on the shoulders of the other. The landlord in Miller's case (2) did not become bound in law to make good "fair wear and tear." The tenant in Clark's case (3) did not become bound in law to provide the cooking and heating facilities involved, or to do the other things referred to. Nevertheless, the court held in Miller's case (2) without reserve or qualification that there had been a "transfer to [the] landlord of [a] burden . . . previously borne by the tenant." Miller's case (2) decides that there is a sufficient "transfer" where the tenant divests himself of a legal obligation to provide a service previously incumbent on him without the assumption of a corresponding legal obligation by the landlord. It is enough if what passes to the landlord is the practical necessity, or, indeed, short of that, the mere expediency, of providing the service himself. This appears plainly from the argument when read in conjunction with the judgment of Scott, L.J. Counsel for the tenant in that case, arguing that there had been no "transfer," said ([1944] K.B. 739):

> "The liability to repair contained in Platini's covenant was not replaced in whole or in part by an undertaking . . . of the landlords."

In his reply counsel for the landlords submitted (ibid.) :

> "There is a transfer of a burden from tenant to landlord if a tenant ceases to be liable for repairs, since, if the landlord does not do the repairs, the property will lose value."

A In his judgment (with which MACKINNON, L.J., agreed), SCOTT, L.J., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 108) :

> ". . . the words of [s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920] are sufficient to cover the interpretation [of counsel for the landlords]."

Miller's case (2), therefore, decides that to constitute a "transfer" of a burden B it is sufficient if one party sheds an obligation to provide a service, and the other party thenceforward has, as a matter, not of contractual duty, but of practical need or even of mere prudence, to provide it for himself. For short we will speak of such a transfer as a transfer of the "practical burden." In Miller's case (2) the Court of Appeal seems to have thought it wholly immaterial whether in the sequel the transferee of the practical burden discharged that C burden by actually providing the service in question for himself or not. The "burden" would still have been transferred to the landlord if he had elected not to make good wear and tear, preferring to see his house deteriorate.

On this simple rule Clark's case (3) embroiders certain qualifications. That part of Clark's case (3) which is here relevant is contained in the judgment of EVERSHED, L.J., with which both of the other members of the court expressed D agreement, though the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., contains some remarks not easy to reconcile with his professed conformity, but the judgment of EVERSHED, L.J., is, at the lowest, a majority judgment. The learned Lord Justice (dealing with cases where there has been something less than the transplantation of an obligation) says in effect that the shifting of the "practical burden" is not merely something which may satisfy the words "transfer of a burden," but E that (a) nothing less will avail to satisfy them ; (b) something more is, or may be, needed to do so ; and he adds (c) that a transfer will not extend to services, the burden of which, though lifted from the landlord, the tenant is incapable in law of assuming. (b) and (c) require elaboration. What is (b) the porro unum necessarium ? In trying to answer this question, I will for simplicity state the answer in terms of the facts of Clark's case (3), in which (unlike the F present) the landlord did not assume, but was relieved of, an obligation. The court appeared to decide that in such a case not merely must the "practical burden" of supplying the relevant services shift to the tenant, but that he must in fact supply them. There is only a transfer of a burden to the extent (to quote the words of EVERSHED, L.J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 175)) that :

> ". . . the various articles covenanted by the landlords in the relevant clause of the lease of 1934 to be provided . . . or other articles for corresponding purposes, must now be and are provided by the tenant."

The order made in pursuance of this decision of the Court of Appeal actually incorporates the words just quoted. As to (c), certain of the obligations of which, in Clark's case (3), the landlord was relieved were obligations to provide H services, such as that of lighting and cleaning the common stair and hall, the burden of which was incapable of transfer to the tenant, because as regards the common stair or hall he had (as against the landlords and the tenants of other flats) nothing more than a right of passage, and he could not light or clean without exceeding his rights. It seems possible that, when EVERSHED, L.J., (and, therefore, the majority of the court) said "must now be and are" (I italicise the last two words), he had in mind only these "non-transferable services" which "are not" provided by the tenant because he is legally incapable of providing them. If that is all the court meant, the limitation embodied in the words "and are" does not apply to the present case in which "untransferable services" play no part. It must, however, be acknowledged that in their literal grammatical sense the words "and are" are apt to include more than "untransferable services," and it is necessary to consider the position on the assumption that they do.

Parenthetically (before dealing with this possibility), I must consider whether and how far the decision in Clark's case (3) (which fell within the first limb of s. 2 (3)) applies to this case (which falls within the second). If in Clark's case (3) the facts had fallen, as in the present case they do, within the second limb of the sub-section, the court which decided Clark's case (3) would, no doubt, have applied a corresponding rule giving effect to the de facto position, and would, accordingly, have held that, if, before the landlord covenanted to provide the relevant services, it was he and not the tenant who in fact provided them, there could not have been said to be a "transfer to [the] landlord" from the tenant of the "burden" of providing them. Indeed, the most forcible way in which the case was put for the tenant was that you cannot speak of a "transfer to the landlord of a burden . . . previously borne by the tenant" when the burden in question was never borne by the tenant at any stage, but was borne by the landlord throughout, till 1943 de facto, and after 1943 de jure as well. Put in this way the argument sounds formidable. Nevertheless, for my part I think it ill-founded. Before the obligation was assumed by the landlord there was a contingent burden on the tenant, and, therefore, on the landlord's assumption of the obligation there was a transfer of a burden to him from the tenant, because, although de facto the landlord in the earlier period supplied hot water, etc., he could in that period at any moment have cut off the supply and forced the tenant to provide it for himself or go without. By the elimination of this risk in 1943 the tenant was emancipated from a disadvantage which can without abuse of language be described as a "burden," and one which, but for what happened in 1943, would very likely from being contingent have become actual owing to the rise in fuel prices. In consequence of what then happened, the tenant shed this burden which settled on the shoulders of the landlord having in its transit assumed the hard lineaments of a legally enforceable obligation.

It may be said that this conclusion is in conflict with the decision in Clark's case (3) embodied in the judgment of EVERSHED, L.J., which is a judgment of at least a majority of the court. In that judgment he appears to say that there is no transfer of burden except in so far as the alleged transferee thereof actually provides the services from the obligation to supply which the alleged transferor has been relieved. A possible interpretation of this statement, as has been noticed above, is one which identifies services, which after the alleged transfer "are not" provided by the tenant, with services which he is legally incapacitated from providing, as in the case of lighting or cleaning the common stair. If Clark's case (3) decided no more than that, it does not touch the present case. If, however, in Clark's case (3) the court is to be held to the literal scope of the words it used when it said "must now be and are," then its decision, in my view, conflicts with that in Miller's case (2), where the factual element reflected in the words "and are" was assumed to be wholly immaterial and a transfer of the (contingent) practical burden was held sufficient per se to satisfy the sub-section. If so, this court is at liberty to follow either of these conflicting decisions, and I am of opinion that it ought to follow that in Miller's case (2).

The foregoing concerns the issue whether or not there was in this case a transfer to the landlords of a burden previously borne by the tenant. There remains to be considered the contention of the tenant, that, even if there was such a transfer, the increase of rent, on the facts of the present case, was not "in respect of " such transfer, as it has to be to attract the operation of the subsection. The ground of this contention is the fact (and finding) that, when in 1943 the landlords raised the rent from £175 to £250, they had either forgotten, or, at all events, did not advert to, the terms on which the previous tenant, Edwards, had held from them. This reasoning assumes that an increase of rent cannot be " in respect of [the] transfer " of a burden unless the landlord increasing the rent consciously relates the two, the increase and the burden, to each other. I do not think that this is a legitimate assumption. " In respect of " is a very comprehensive expression. Provided there is (a) an increase of rent, (b) not more than commensurate with the quantum of the burden transferred, and (c) substantially contemporary with its transfer, the words " in respect of [the] transfer " are, in my view, satisfied, and this accords with the observations of SCOTT, L.J. ([1944] 2 All E.R. 109) in Miller's case (2) about the disturbance and readjustment of the equilibrium of the lease.

In the result, I think, first, that the landlords are entitled to succeed in their claim, not as to £43 15*s*. only, but prima facie as to £62 10*s*. ; and, secondly, that the tenant's counterclaim should fail except in so far as the county court judge may decide that the burden transferred is over-valued at £75 per annum. In such an event he may evaluate the landlords' claim for one quarter's rent at something intermediate between £43 15*s*. and £62 10*s*.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree with the judgments of my Lord and of ASQUITH, L.J. It is as well to bear steadily in mind the facts of this case. The flat was let from 1935 to 1939 at £175 a year. The landlord was then under no obligation to provide hot water, but he did in fact do so. The flat was empty from 1939 to 1943. Then it was let at £250 a year, but with the significant difference that the landlord bound himself to provide hot water. The cost of fuel and labour had, of course, greatly increased between 1939 and 1943, and, whilst in 1939 it was, no doubt, economically possible for the landlord to provide hot water free for his tenants, it may well have been economically impossible for him to do so in 1943 unless there was some increase in the rent. At any rate, the tenant then agreed to pay £250 a year for the flat. Now the tenant says that the increase from £175 to £250 was invalid. If his contention is correct, it means that in return for £175 a year he will not only get the benefits which the 1939 tenant got for that sum, but he will also get this additional benefit thrown in—he will be able to insist on the landlord providing hot water free of any cost to the tenant no matter how much the cost of fuel and labour has already increased or may hereafter increase, and he will be able to recover two years' over-payment at £75 a year. It is difficult to suppose that the legislature intended not only to peg rents at the 1939 level, but also to enable a tenant to get additional benefits without extra payment. If I thought that the legislature foresaw the situation and nevertheless intended that result, I would, of course, give effect to it, but the question is whether it did so. Section 1 of the Act of 1920 (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I), of course, pegs the rent at the 1939 level, but s. 2 (3) authorises the landlord to increase the rent in certain cases. The question is whether this is one of the cases in which an increase is authorised.

The courts have already done a good deal to define the scope of s. 2 (3). Two things are clearly necessary. First, it is necessary to compare the terms of the present tenancy with the terms of the previous tenancy which existed when the standard rent was payable. The sub-section is quite clear on this point. The " terms " on which the dwelling-house is held must be on the whole " less favourable " or " not less favourable " than the previous terms. " Terms " here means terms which are binding by contract or imposed by statute. Secondly, it is necessary that the change in the terms should result in, or be the result of, a transfer of a burden or liability from one to the other. For this purpose the transfer need not be a contractual transfer, nor need the burden be a contractual burden. The sub-section is satisfied if the change of terms puts on the one, as a matter of practice, the burden of doing work which had previously fallen on the other. In this case the first requisite is satisfied. The present terms are more favourable to the tenant than the previous terms because the landlord undertook a binding obligation to provide hot water, to remove refuse, and so forth. But was the second requisite satisfied ? Was the tenant previously under any " burden " which now falls on the landlord ? It is said that during the previous tenancy the landlord did, in fact, provide the hot water, and that, therefore, the tenant was under no burden. This is where the rub comes. I confess that, according to the ordinary meaning of the word " burden," the tenant was under no burden previously to provide hot water. But neither was the landlord. There was no legal obligation on the landlord to provide hot water, and if he, for any reason, good or bad, decided to cut it off, the tenant would have no legal ground of complaint. When the price of fuel rose, the landlord would both legally and morally have been justified in saying that he would not provide hot water unless he was paid a contribution towards the increase in cost. The tenant was, therefore, under the contingent burden, as a matter of practice, of providing the hot water himself, or paying a contribution towards the increased cost, or going without. Under the changed terms, all that burden falls on the landlord. No matter how much the price of fuel rises, no matter how difficult it is to obtain, the landlord can no longer cut off the hot water or ask the tenant for a contribution towards the increase in cost. The change of terms does, therefore, put on the landlord a burden which previously fell contingently on the tenant.

The question for decision in this case is whether we are at liberty to extend the ordinary meaning of " burden " so as to include a contingent burden of the kind I have described. Now this court has already held in Winchester Court, Ltd. v. Miller (2), that s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 is to be liberally construed so as to give effect to the governing principles embodied in the legislation, and I think we should do the same. Whenever a statute comes up for consideration it must be remembered that it is not within human powers to foresee the manifold sets of facts which may arise, and, even if it were, it is not possible to provide for them in terms free from all ambiguity. The English language is not an instrument of mathematical precision. Our literature would be much the poorer if it were. This is where the draftsmen of Acts of Parliament have often been unfairly criticised. A judge, believing himself to be fettered by the supposed rule that he must look to the language and nothing else, laments that the draftsmen have not provided for this or that, or have been guilty of some or other ambiguity. It would certainly save the judges trouble if Acts of Parliament were drafted with divine prescience and perfect clarity. In the absence of it, when a defect appears a judge cannot simply fold his hands and blame the draftsman. He must set to work on the constructive task of finding the intention of Parliament, and he must do this not only from the language of the statute, but also from a consideration of the social conditions which gave rise to it and of the mischief which it was passed to remedy, and then he must supplement the written word so as to give " force and life " to the intention of the legislature. That was clearly laid down (3 Co. Rep. 7b) by the resolution of the judges [Sir Roger Manwood, C.B., and the other barons of the Exchequer] in Heydon's case (4), and it is the safest guide to-day. Good practical advice on the subject was given about the same time by Plowden in his note (2 Plowd. 465) to Eyston v. Studd (5). Put into homely metaphor it is this : A judge should ask himself the question how, if the makers of the Act had themselves come across this ruck in the texture of it, they would have straightened it out ? He must then do as they would have done. A judge must not alter the material of which the Act is woven, but he can and should iron out the creases. Approaching this case in that way, I cannot help feeling that the legislature had not specifically in mind a contingent burden such as we have here. If it had, would it not have put it on the same footing as an actual burden ? I think it would. It would have permitted an increase of rent when the terms were so changed as to put a positive legal burden on the landlord. If the parties expressly agreed between themselves the amount of the increase on that account, the court would give effect to their agreement, but if, as here, they did not direct their minds to the point, the court has itself to assess the amount of the increase. It has to say how much the tenant should pay "in respect of" the transfer of this burden to the landlord. It should do this by asking what a willing tenant would agree to pay and a willing landlord would agree to accept in respect of it. Just as, in the earlier cases, the courts were able to assess the value of the "fair wear and tear" clause and of a "cooker," so they can assess the value of the hot water clause and translate it fairly in terms of rent, and what applies to hot water applies also to the removal of refuse and so forth. I agree that the appeal should be allowed, and with the order proposed by ASQUITH, L.J.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the county court judge to determine whether and, if so, to what extent, the burden transferred to the appellants was over-valued at £75 per annum. The landlords to have the costs of the appeal. No costs of the cross-appeal. Costs of the first and second proceedings in the county court to be in discretion of the county court judge.

[LEEDS ASSIZES (Streatfeild, J.), May 7, 1948.]

Marriage—Solemnisation—Islamic ceremony—Ceremony in private house—Indictment—Marriage Act, 1836 (c. 85), s. 39.

By s. 39 of the Marriage Act, 1836 : "Every person who . . . shall knowingly and wilfully solemnise any marriage in England, except by special licence, in any other place than a church or chapel, in which marriages may be solemnised according to the rites of the Church of England, or than the registered building or office specified in the notice [of marriage] and [registrar's] certificate . . . shall be guilty of felony."

A Mohammedan purported to perform a marriage ceremony in England in accordance with the Islamic faith between a Mohammedan, who was already married to a woman in India, and an English woman. The ceremony took place in a private house which was not registered for the solemnisation of marriages, and no special licence had been obtained. On the prosecution of the defendant for an offence under s. 39 the indictment charged him with solemnising the marriage without a special licence in a place other than a church or chapel in which marriages may be solemnised according to the rites of the Church of England "or than a registered building or office in which a marriage may validly be solemnised, namely, [the private house]."

HELD : although the indictment did not follow the exact wording of s. 39 it sufficiently defined the offence with which the defendant was charged and was good.

The trial proceeding, it was contended on behalf of the defendant that the ceremony was not the solemnisation of a marriage within the meaning of s. 39 since Mohammedan law recognised polygamy which was contrary to the English conception of marriage.

Held: the fact that by English law this marriage was invalid, the "husband" being already married, did not prevent the ceremony performed by the defendant being the solemnisation of a marriage within s. 39, and, therefore, there was a case for him to answer.

Submissions on Points of Law on a charge under the Marriage Act, 1836, s. 39.

The defendant was charged under the section that on Dec. 12, 1947, he "knowingly and wilfully did solemnise a marriage between Mohammed Hassan Mia and Mary Jane Brown without a special licence in a place other than a church or chapel in which marriages may be solemnised according to the rites of the Church of England or than a registered building or office in which a marriage may validly be solemnised, namely, [a private house]." Before the defendant had pleaded to the charge his counsel sought to quash the indictment on the ground that it did not follow the words of the section on which the charge was based, but this contention was overruled. It was then contended that the ceremony, which was conducted in accordance with the Islamic faith, was not a solemnisation of marriage within the meaning of s. 39. Streatfeild, J., ruled that "marriage" in s. 39 did not necessarily mean a marriage which was valid according to English law.

Hurwitz (Sheikh Abdul Gafur and J. T. Williams with him) for the defendant: The indictment as framed does not follow the words of the statute, but contains words which the learned draftsman has inserted, and, therefore, attempts to create an offence of which the defendant cannot be convicted. The indictment follows the words of s. 39 up to the word "office," and then substitutes the words "in which a marriage may validly be solemnised." The wording of the section is "other than a building or office specified in the notice and certificate." In this class of offence, which is highly technical, the prosecution must fail unless they can prove that the case comes within the four corners of the section.

Clough for the Crown: The wording of the indictment, involving, as it does, a slight deviation from the precise wording of the section, was chosen solely with a view to presenting the particulars of the alleged offence in the clearest possible way. The notice, which is referred to in s. 4 of the Act, deals with one way in which a marriage, as a result of a valid formality, may properly be solemnised, and it was unnecessary to set out the exact wording of s. 39 and refer to the notice as specified in s. 4.

STREATFEILD, J.: I consider that the indictment is drawn in such a way that, even although it does not follow the ipsissima verba of s. 39 of A the Act, it sufficiently defines what the alleged offence is, and in those circumstances I think the indictment is good.

On the trial proceeding it was contended for the defence that the ceremony, which was conducted in accordance with the Islamic faith, was not a solemnisation of marriage within the meaning of the Act of 1836.

Clough for the Crown.

STREATFEILD J.: I have to rule as a matter of law whether there is a case for the defendant to answer under s. 39 of the Marriage Act, 1836, for which purpose it is necessary for me to construe the meaning of the word C " marriage ", particularly in the context " solemnise any marriage in England." It has been submitted to me that, this being a penal Act, one may not read into the statute any words which are not there, and with that submission I agree. The word " marriage," however, is not defined, and it seems, therefore, that I have to construe the word in relation to the objects of this penal Act. It has been submitted that this was not a marriage or a solemnisation of a D marriage because it was a marriage between a Mohammedan and an English woman who had been converted to Islam, by Mohammedan law limited polygamy is recognised, and that cuts at the root of the English conception of the word " marriage " which is said to be the union of one man and one woman and no other. In construing the word " marriage " in this sense I must be influenced by corresponding words in the Offences against the Person Act, E 1861, whatever may be the construction of the word when used in Acts concerning matrimonial causes, and on looking at s. 57 of the Act of 1861, which creates the offence of bigamy, one sees the word " marriage " used as meaning two different things. The words in s. 57 are:

> " Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall F have taken place in England or Ireland, or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony . . ."

Clearly the words " being married " mean " being lawfully married " and the words " shall marry " and " second marriage " refer to a marriage which is not only unlawful and void, but which in itself gives rise to a criminal offence, and therefore must mean a purported marriage or a form of marriage. G It matters not whether the bigamous marriage takes place in a registry office or whether it takes place in a church or a synagogue or other place of worship. It seems clear, therefore, that in that penal Act the word " marriage " means a purported marriage, and, although that Act is of later date than the one which I am construing, that is of assistance in determining the meaning of the words " solemnise any marriage in England " in the Act of 1836.

H Reference has been made to how far the law has recognised Hindu marriages, and certainly it appears that in 1866 LORD PENZANCE laid down that because of its intrinsically polygamous nature a Hindu marriage could not be recognised in this country. Later decisions, however, appear to have put a different interpretation on a Hindu marriage than were there stated. In 1946 BARNARD, J., in giving judgment in Srini Vasan (otherwise Clayton) v. Srini Vasan (1), after reciting LORD PENZANCE'S decision in Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (2) and quoting from the speech of LORD MAUGHAM in the Sinha

(Peerage) case (3), came to the conclusion that the textbook view that the only kind of marriage which English law recognises is a monogamous one was wrong. He continued ([1945] 2 All E.R. 23) :

> " . . . and, relying as I do on the above passages from LORD MAUGHAM's speech, I ought, therefore, to recognise this Hindu marriage as a valid marriage . . . To deny recognition of a Hindu marriage for the purpose in hand would, in my opinion, be to fly in the face of common sense, good manners and the ordered system of tolerance on which the Empire is based." A

With those words I respectfully agree. In these days it would be intolerable if we in this country were to refuse to recognise the validity of a Hindu marriage because polygamy is recognised under that faith and not under the faith of B the Established Church of England. It is noticeable that in that case there was a Hindu marriage which was celebrated or performed in England, although it is true it was performed at a registry office and in compliance with the requirements of the Marriage Act, 1836.

Counsel for the Crown relies also on the words of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Berthiaume v. Dastous (4) C where he states ([1930] A.C. 83) :

> " If a marriage is good by the laws of the country where it is effected, it is good all the world over, no matter whether the proceeding or ceremony which constituted marriage according to the law of the place would or would not constitute marriage in the country of the domicil of one or D other of the spouses. If the so-called marriage is no marriage in the place where it is celebrated, there is no marriage anywhere, although the ceremony or proceeding if conducted in the place of the parties' domicil would be considered a good marriage."

There is, therefore, nothing to support the view that merely because this was a Mohammedan marriage—or purported to be a Mohammedan marriage E —it is not recognisable in this country on the ground that polygamy is permitted in India, and, indeed, this bridegroom was married to a woman in India already. It does not prevent this from being the solemnisation of a marriage, even although it should turn out that by the law of this country, he already being married, it was an invalid marriage. It was, in my opinion, none the less the solemnisation of a marriage and I construe the word " marriage " in s. 39 of F the Act of 1836 as having the same meaning as it does in the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, s. 57.

His Lordship, accordingly, ruled that there was a case for the defendant to answer.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), May 25, 26, June 2, 1949.]

Negligence—Invitee—Duty of occupier—Protection against "unusual danger"—Workman slipping from staging.

A welder had been employed for some months in welding strips of steel on the ribs of a trawler lying in a wet dock. The contractors (to whom the welder's employers were sub-contractors) had provided a staging on which the welder could work, comprising four boards, five feet apart, each about twenty feet long by eleven inches wide and three inches deep, supported on iron beams or angle-irons, 3½ ins. by three inches, across the fish house (part of the hold) in which he worked, at a height of five feet five inches. The only means of getting from one board to another was by stepping on an angle-iron. When handing a tool-box to a fellow welder on the adjoining board the welder put one foot on the angle-iron, but his foot slipped and he fell astride the angle-iron, sustaining injuries. In an action by the welder for damages for negligence against the contractors :

HELD : the duty owed by the contractor as invitor to the welder as invitee was to prevent damage from unusual danger, and "unusual danger" meant a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee and not appreciated by him, acting reasonably and exercising due care for his safety, in the circumstances in which he was availing himself of the invitation ; the welder had been engaged in similar work all his life and had worked on the staging for some weeks before the accident, using the angle iron when stepping from one board to another ; the danger, therefore, was known to him and one usual in his daily work ; it was immaterial whether or not he had freely and voluntarily, expressly or impliedly, agreed to incur that danger ; and, consequently, he could not succeed.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff was a boiler-maker who for 34 years had been an electric-welder. He was employed by the Thames Welding Co., Ltd., who, in December, 1946, had a sub-contract with the defendants to do welding work on the trawler "Valmont" lying in a wet dock of the East India Docks. The defendants had contracted with the owners to re-convert the "Valmont" into a fishing trawler after its release from requisition during the war. The plaintiff's work was primarily to weld strips of steel to the ribs of the trawler. When in use by the Navy the trawler had had a false deck (since removed) built in the fish house (part of the hold) supported by two thwart ship iron beams or angle-irons. The angle-irons were 3½ ins. by three inches in size and five feet five inches from the cement lining at the bottom of the trawler. A staging had been provided by the defendants for use, inter alios, by the plaintiff in carrying out the work. It had been erected by shipwrights employed by them and neither the plaintiff nor any of the employees of the Thames Welding Co., Ltd., had any right to interfere with it, any alterations or additions being carried out by the defendants at the request of the Thames Welding Co., Ltd. The staging comprised four boards or deals, about twenty feet long by eleven inches wide and three inches thick. They rested on the two angle-irons in the fish house, one being placed eighteen inches from the port side and the others at intervals of five feet to within eighteen inches of the starboard side. A ladder ran from the cement lining of the ship to the deck, and there was no other moveable ladder. To cross from one board to another and to use the ladder it was necessary to step on an angle-iron. No serious complaints were made by the plaintiff as to the insufficiency of the staging supplied, and after the accident hereinafter referred to he returned to work almost immediately and continued on the same work with the staging in the same condition for eight months.

On Dec. 16, 1946, the plaintiff had, while standing on one of the middle boards on the starboard side, been welding an iron under the deck and had been using a wooden tool box eighteen inches by fourteen inches by nine inches deep, containing a hammer, chisel and welding rod and weighing in all about fourteen pounds. His fellow welder, one Fletcher, climbed on the board adjoining his, ready to take his (the plaintiff's) place in accordance with the usual practice, and the plaintiff picked up the tool box to hand it to Fletcher. To do so, the plaintiff placed one foot on the angle iron and leaned across. Fletcher took the box, but the plaintiff, in attempting to replace his foot on the staging, slipped, fell, and was injured. The plaintiff received medical attention the same day, and later returned to work. He continued to do the same work on the staging until August, 1947, making no claim for damages until Mar. 23, 1948. LYNSKEY, J., held that the defendants were not liable.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 2. LYNSKEY, J., read a judgment in which he dealt with the facts and continued :—The only explanation of the plaintiff's slip and fall is either the comparatively narrow foot-hold available to him on the angle-iron or some inattention or carelessness on his part. The plaintiff says that in these circumstances his injury was caused by a breach of duty which the defendants, as invitors, owed to him as an invitee. The duty to an invitee is stated in that oft-quoted passage from the judgment of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (1) and is (L.R. 1 C.P. 288) :

> " . . . that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know ; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care had been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as a matter of fact."

From this passage it seems clear that the only duty imposed on the invitor, or occupier, is to prevent damage from unusual danger. This, of course, raises the question of what is unusual danger. Is it danger unusual generally, or is it danger unusual in premises of the type, description and use, to which the invitation is extended, or is it a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee, regard being had to the type, description and use of the premises to which he has been invited ? In my view, " unusual danger " means a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee : see PHILLIMORE, L.J.'s judgment ([1915] 1 K.B. 596) in Norman v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). It must be, from his point of view, unexpected in the particular circumstances in which he is availing himself of the invitation. It may be that other persons might expect such dangers or might know of their existence in the premises on which he goes, but if he, acting reasonably and exercising due care for his own safety, did not appreciate the existence of the danger, or its nature, or its extent, it would be to him an unusual danger. On the contrary, if an invitee does appreciate the existence on the premises to which he is invited of a danger and its nature and extent, it cannot be to him an unusual danger.

In the case before me the plaintiff was an experienced ship-welder who, at the time of the accident, was 67 years of age and had worked all his life as a ship's boiler-maker or ship's welder. He had been employed on the "Valmont" from about August, 1946, and for more than a month had been welding in the fish house and had seen the staging provided. He had worked on that staging for some weeks before the accident and knew from experience that he had to use the angle-irons if he desired to step from one deal to another, or from the ladder provided to a deal, or vice versa. He knew, if not by measurement at least by vision, the size of the deals, their distance apart, and the size of the angle-irons. Such risk as there was in using such angle-irons with his experience was, in my view, obvious to him. Whatever might have been the position on the first day he worked on the staging, by the date of the accident the danger, such as it was, had become one of the usual dangers of his daily work and could not be regarded, so far as he was concerned, as an unusual one.

Counsel for the plaintiff contended before me that, even though the plaintiff knew of the danger, it would remain to him an unusual one unless it could be shown that he, freely and voluntarily, with a full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran, expressly or impliedly agreed to incur it. In other words, unless a defence of volenti non fit injuria would succeed, the risk remained to the plaintiff an unusual one, and he cited in support of his contention Letang v. Ottawa Electric Ry. Co. (3) and other cases where the defence of volenti had been set up and failed. It is enough, in my view, that the invitee appreciates the existence of the danger and its nature and extent, even although he did not freely and voluntarily, expressly or impliedly, agree to incur it. It was said before me that if a workman is put in the position of either having to incur the known risk or lose his work, he does not freely and voluntarily, expressly or impliedly, agree to incur it. That may or may not be true, but in these days of trade unions and shop stewards I very much doubt if there are many cases where a workman would be placed in such a position. Even if he were, I do not think it would operate to extend the duty owed to him by an invitor. There was no evidence before me that the plaintiff would lose his employment if he refused to work on the staging provided. He never complained to his own foreman and even after his accident he worked on the same staging without complaint either by himself or any of his fellow workers. The plaintiff did not suggest that his failure to complain was due to any fear of losing his work. If it were necessary to decide it I should have held on the facts of this case that the plaintiff did freely and voluntarily impliedly agree to accept the risk of working on the staging with full knowledge of the nature and the extent of the risk he ran.

In the result, I find that there was no breach of duty on the part of the defendants to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff's claim, therefore, fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

LANDEAU v. MARCHBANK AND OTHERS.

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant to repair—Breach—Measure of damages—Determination of lease—Conversion of premises into flats—Premises not in good repair—Value of reversion not diminished—Lessee liable in nominal damages—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1): "Damages for a breach of a covenant or agreement to keep or put premises in repair during the currency of a lease, or to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, whether such covenant or agreement is expressed or implied, and whether general or specific, shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid; and in particular no damage shall be recovered for a breach of any such covenant or agreement to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, if it is shown that the premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement."

On the determination of a lease the premises were sold for £7,000, which was admitted by the parties to be a good price, for conversion into two flats and two maisonettes. When delivered up by the lessees the premises were not in good state of repair as required by the covenants contained in the lease, and the assignee of the benefit of the covenants brought an action for damages for the breach. Holding himself bound by the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18, the master, in assessing the amount due to the lessor, excluded from his calculations the cost of effecting repairs rendered valueless by the contemplated conversion but included all such repairs as were not so rendered useless.

HELD: lack of repair was not in itself prima facie evidence of damage to the reversion, and before the lessor could recover any sum the court must be satisfied not only that there had been a breach of the covenant to repair but also that, as the result of that breach, there had been a diminution in the value of the reversion; the plaintiff had not proved any such diminution; and, accordingly, she was only entitled to an award of nominal damages.

MOTIONS to accept and to vary the report of a master or to remit the matter for re-consideration in an action by the assignee of the benefit of the covenants for breach of a covenant to repair.

The question of the amount due to the plaintiff had been referred to a master who in his report assessed the damages at £148 5*s.* 0*d.* It was contended by the lessees that failure to keep the premises in good repair was in itself no proof that there had been damage to the reversion, and, therefore, the master acted on a wrong principle in assuming that all repairs not rendered valueless by reason of the contemplated conversion of the premises must be regarded as damage to the reversion. LYNSKEY, J., held that the contention of the lessees was right and made an award of nominal damages for the breach.

L. R. Miller for the defendants.

A LYNSKEY, J.: This case came before me so long ago as June 3 and 4, 1948, and I then made an order referring to a learned master the question of the amount arising thereunder for decision. In my judgment, after referring to the terms of s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, as to the rights of a landlord to recover damages for breach of covenant to repair or keep in repair, I then said this:

> B "That right was a right under s. 18 of the Act to recover the value of the repairs necessary, in so far as such repairs did not exceed in value the amount, if any, by which the value of the reversion in the premises was diminished. In those circumstances, that being the test that must be applied under this section, and also structural alterations being at that time in contemplation, and having, in fact, been made, which would C render at least some of these repairs valueless, in my view, the plaintiff is entitled to recover such sum, if any, by which the value of the reversion had been depreciated in value, regard being had to the fact that alterations were then in contemplation—and, indeed, authorised—to transform the premises into two flats and two maisonettes, so that some of the repairs, if not all of them, would be rendered valueless. That, in my D view, is the right the plaintiff has to damages, and to ascertain what that is in money means an investigation, first, into the conditions statement; secondly, into the dilapidations statement; thirdly, into the particulars set out in the statement of claim and what repairs it is there said are necessary; fourthly, an investigation whether the value of the reversion was diminished at all, and, if so by what amount . . . and, E finally, an investigation in view of the fact that the premises were to be structurally altered, whether those repairs, if they had been undertaken, would have been valueless, so far as improving the value of the property was concerned. That matter, it is agreed by the parties, should be referred to a master for a report."

I made an order accordingly and the matter was dealt with by Master F SIMNER. In his report dated Feb. 25, 1949, he dealt with the various items of lack of repair alleged by the plaintiff, and considered in each case whether that particular item had been rendered valueless or reduced in value from the point of view of the owner of the reversion by reason of the contemplated, and, in fact, actual, conversion of the premises. Having done that, he found that £148 5*s.* 0*d.* would be the cost of doing so much of the repairs to the G premises as had not been rendered valueless by the scheme for conversion. He also found that that was the amount by which the value of the reversion had been diminished. That report having been made, the defendants have given notice under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 54, to move to vary the report, or to remit the matter for re-consideration by Master SIMNER or some other master. The defendants seek to vary the report mainly because there was H no evidence of diminution in the value of the reversion to the extent of £148 5*s.* 0*d.*, or at all. It is clear that the master, in arriving at this figure of the damage to the reversion, has adopted the cost of what I may call the useful repairs which were not rendered useless by reason of the conversion scheme, and has taken the view that that, in the circumstances of this case, was the damage to the reversion. The defendants say that that is the wrong test to apply. They say that there must be evidence of actual damage to the reversion, either by expert evidence of the value of the reversion without the repairs and of its value if the premises had been in good state of repair, in order to be able to subtract one from the other, or there must be direct evidence that, in fact, the price realised for the reversion has been influenced by the fact that the premises were in that bad state of repair, or not in a better state of repair.

It seems to me that the master has not applied the tests which are laid down by the authorities in Espir v. Basil Street Hotel, Ltd. (1), where the question had to be considered by the Court of Appeal on appeal from a county court what was the principle on which damages should be assessed for breach of a covenant not to make structural alterations. SLESSER, L.J., said in his judgment ([1936] 3 All E.R. 94) :

> " . . . the right principle appears to me that which has been enunciated in the case of Witham v. Kershaw (2). That was an action for waste brought by the reversioner against the tenant upon a covenant by the tenant not to commit waste on the demised property, and the question arose as to what was the proper measure of damage. It is pointed out by LORD ESHER (16 Q.B.D. 616) that : 'It would be wrong to say that the reversionary value had necessarily been diminished by the cost of restoring the property to its original condition.' He seemed to think, as I understand him in that case, that : 'The value of the reversion might be diminished, but the question of how much injured would be a question of value, and the proper way to ascertain the damages would be to ask skilled valuers to say how much the property has been diminished in value '."

SCOTT, L.J., in giving judgment agreeing, said (ibid., 96) :

> "I think it is quite clear, from the terms of the judge's note that he was taking the view that the cost of restoring the premises, and particularly replacing the flooring which had been cut away, was germane to the measure of damages. I conclude from that, that he was rejecting the true measure of damages, namely, the injury to the reversion, in the sense of the present depreciation in the present value of the ultimate reversion. That being so, I think he was guilty of an error of law in applying the measure which he did apply."

That case was followed by Salisbury v. Gilmore (3), where MACKINNON, L.J., adopts the same idea, and he said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 462) that :

> "In my opinion, there was no evidence at the trial of any diminution in the value of the reversion by reason of any breach of covenant to repair, or yield up in repair, by the defendant. There was in fact no evidence for the plaintiff of any breach of (a) the covenant to keep in repair during the term. No complaint of any such breach had ever been made. The plaintiffs' surveyors had inspected the property in July, 1937, but they gave no evidence of finding any breach then. The only evidence as to breach was under (b) the covenant to deliver up in repair, upon a survey and schedule of dilapidations made after such delivery up. As to the effect of this breach on the value of the reversion, the first surveyor could only say that the depreciation was 'the cost of doing the repairs,' but on cross-examination said 'I am not in a position to answer' (as to the depreciation) 'because it is a question of the value of the premises, and as a surveyor assessing dilapidations, I was only concerned with the cost of making the repairs '."

Then the learned Lord Justice deals with the evidence of the other surveyor, and comes to the conclusion that there was no evidence of any diminution in value to the reversion before HILBERY, J., from whom that appeal lay.

It seems to me that, having regard to those decisions, the fact that repairs are necessary is not in itself even prima facie evidence of damage to the value of the reversion. In certain circumstances it may be an important factor, but of itself the fact that a certain amount of repair needs to be done does not, in my view, necessarily mean that there is damage to the reversion. If very extensive repairs were necessary to a small property, then, of course, A the inference would be clear; if one had very small repairs to a very large property of great value, the inference might be impossible to draw. It must depend on the circumstances.

In the present case the property changed hands for about £7,000, which, everybody agrees, was a good price. The actual value of the repairs which were useful was £148 5*s.* 0*d.* as found by the master. The total repairs B necessary were some £242, according to the claim by the plaintiffs, and this property was bought with the idea of conversion into flats and maisonettes. No witness called before the master gave any evidence that there had been a depreciation in the value of the reversion, and not one of the experts called attempted to quantify any depreciation in that value. In those circumstances, I am compelled to hold that there was no evidence before the master of any C depreciation in the value of the reversion. Before the plaintiffs can recover any sum they must satisfy the court that not only has there been a breach of the covenant, but, as the result of that breach, there has been a diminution in the value of the reversion. That being so, it seems to me the master's report cannot be supported.

DAVIES v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION.

F [COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), May 24, 1949.]

Negligence—Tramcar—Starting signal given by unauthorised person—Conductor absent from platform—Injury to plaintiff.

As the plaintiff was attempting to board a tramcar belonging to the defendant corporation at a request stopping place an unauthorised person G (a passenger) gave the driver the starting signal by ringing the bell. The car started when the plaintiff had one foot on the step of the car and she fell and was injured. At the time of the occurrence the conductor was on the upper deck of the car collecting fares.

HELD: as there was an appreciable time while the car was halted at the stopping place during which the conductor, in breach of his duty and H without sufficient excuse, was absent from the platform of the car from which he should have given the starting signal, and as he might have foreseen that an unauthorised person might ring the starting bell if he absented himself from the platform, the conductor was negligent, and the corporation was liable to the plaintiff.

Appeal by defendants from a decision of the Assistant Presiding Judge of the Liverpool Court of Passage by which he gave judgment for the plaintiff A for £38 12*s*. in an action in which the plaintiff claimed damages for personal injuries as a result of the negligence of a servant of the defendant corporation.

A tramcar belonging to the corporation stopped at a request stop at which five women, including the plaintiff, were waiting to board it. Three of the women boarded the tramcar, but when the plaintiff had one foot on the step the car started. At the time the conductor was not on the platform of the B car, but was collecting fares on the upper deck, and the bell signal to the driver to start was sounded by one of the passengers, an unauthorised person. The appeal was dismissed.

C

TUCKER, L.J., stated the facts and continued : The learned judge found that the conductor was in breach of his duty and had made no effort to come down to the platform. In his notes on the grounds for his judgment he amplified that by saying :

> "I was not satisfied that the conductor made any endeavour to come from the top deck for the purpose of re-starting the car, but I was of D opinion that, notwithstanding that a number of persons were boarding it, he showed gross indifference. I was of opinion in all the circumstances that, the car having stopped for an appreciable time while a number of persons were boarding it, he could have come down from the upper deck to see to it that it was safe for the car to re-start."

I think that we ought to accept that finding of the judge, who saw the witnesses and heard them, with regard to the conduct of the conductor. There was no evidence given with regard to the number of the passengers in this tramcar or how many fares the conductor had to collect on the top deck. It was not his case that it was physically impossible for him in the proper performance of his duties to be on the platform. His case was that he was trying to get there F after having collected a few fares upstairs, but was prevented from doing so by the presence of someone coming up the stairs. The learned judge has rejected that explanation and has found that there was an appreciable time while these persons were boarding the car during which the conductor, in breach of his duty and without sufficient excuse, was absent from the place where he should have been, he being the only person authorised to give the starting signal G when the time had come for the tramcar to start. On the basis of that finding it appears to me that the defendants are clearly liable, because I think that one of the reasons why the attendance of the conductor on the platform is desirable—I do not say always essential ; there may be reasons which excuse his absence—at all stopping places where practicable is because he is the only person authorised to give the starting signal. In view of the finding that some H unauthorised person had started the tramcar during the appreciable time for which the conductor was absent, I think the plaintiff succeeds, because I think that that is one of the things against the happening of which the conductor is required to be on the platform. In those circumstances, I think that on the facts of this particular case the judgment must stand.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. The case raised, I think, some difficulty for reasons which have been referred to by Tucker, L.J. The actual decision by the learned judge is not wholly satisfactory, because he seems to have rejected evidence which was not really disputed at the hearing. I have, however, on the whole come to the conclusion that the appeal fails, and I can state my reasons very shortly. We must, I think, accept the learned judge's finding that the conductor made no attempt to do what the conductor himself by his evidence impliedly admitted was his duty, namely, to come down with reasonable speed to the platform, the tramcar having stopped. I think we must accept that finding in this court. If he had done as he said, namely, started to come down at or about the time when the tramcar stopped, there would have been evidence of the period of time which had elapsed between the stopping of the tramcar and the ringing of the bell by the unauthorised person. If he had started to come down and the bell had been rung before he could get to the platform, the court might have come to the conclusion that he had done everything which was reasonable and that the defendants were not liable, but, the learned judge having found that he made no attempt to come down, we have no satisfactory evidence as to time, and, therefore, the defendants cannot ask us to assume that the time was necessarily so short that the carrying out by the conductor of his duty could have made no difference to the result. I have some sympathy with the conductors of tramcars and omnibuses in these days. They have a number of things to do and they cannot be in two places at once. It, however, is accepted that on an occasion like this, unless there is some special circumstance which makes it impracticable or impossible, it was the conductor's business to make his way to the platform. The judge having found that he did not attempt to carry out that duty, for the reasons which I have given I think the appeal must fail.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. It is the duty of the corporation to use reasonable care in the way in which they run their cars so as not to involve their passengers or intending passengers in danger. The plaintiff was injured without any fault on her part because the tramcar started off before she had time to get on. That does not ordinarily happen if those who run the tramcars use reasonable care, and I think it was for the corporation to explain how the accident happened. They failed to satisfy the Assistant Presiding Judge on that point. It was clearly the conductor's business to get down to the platform as quickly as he reasonably could so as to see to the safety of the people who were boarding the car and to start it when they had boarded it. He did not do so, and an unauthorised stranger rang the bell. The conductor might reasonably have foreseen that that might happen if he did not come down quickly. The corporation are, therefore, liable for the consequences. An unauthorised or wrongful act of a third person does not break the chain of causation if it might reasonably have been foreseen. Nor in like case are the consequences too remote. The conductor here, as a reasonable man, should have said to himself: "It is quite possible that, if I don't go down quickly, someone else may ring the bell." That is enough to make him liable. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re SELBY-WALKER (deceased). PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. SELBY-WALKER AND OTHERS

[Chancery Division (Roxburgh, J.), May 13, 1949.]

Will—Legacy—Interest—Legacy payable at 21—Trustees empowered to use legacy or any part thereof for education of legatee until he shall attain the age of 21—Payment of interest from date of testator's death.

By his will the testator gave to his sister and her husband "£1,000 in trust until my godson St. J. shall attain the age of 21 years to use the said sum or any part thereof in their absolute discretion before that time for purposes of the education of the said St. J. and upon his attaining the age of 21 years to hold the sum of £1,000 or the residue after any such payment as aforesaid for my godson absolutely." The godson was still an infant and the question to be determined was whether the legacy carried interest as from the date of the testator's death or only as from the expiration of a year after his death.

Held : the legacy carried interest as from the death of the testator. Re Churchill ([1909] 2 Ch. 431), applied.

[As to Interest on Legacies, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 14, pp. 353, 354, paras. 661, 662 ; and for Cases, see DIGEST, Vol. 23, pp. 453-455, Nos. 5271-5287.]

Case referred to :

(1) Re Churchill, [1909] 2 Ch. 431 ; 79 L.J.Ch. 10 ; 101 L.T. 380 ; 23 Digest 455, 5287.

Adjourned Summons to determine (inter alia) whether a legacy of £1,000 bequeathed by cl. 3 of the testator's will carried interest as from the date of his death or only as from the expiration of a year after his death.

By his will, dated Jan. 25, 1938, the testator, Kenneth Selby-Walker, appointed the Public Trustee and George Francis Medlam (who later renounced probate) executors and trustees and directed that within one month of his death his widow should be paid £500, free of all duty, for her absolute use and benefit. By cl. 2 he gave a small pecuniary legacy. By cl. 3 he gave to his half-sister, Mrs. Ethel Arcedeckne-Butler, and her husband "£1,000 in trust until my godson St. John Patrick Arcedeckne-Butler shall attain the age of 21 years to use the said sum or any part thereof in their absolute discretion before that time for purposes of the education of the said St. John Patrick Arcedeckne-Butler and upon his attaining the age of 21 years to hold the sum of £1,000 or the residue after any such payment as aforesaid for my godson absolutely." Subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies given by his will, the testator left the residue to his widow for life and on her death (in the events which had happened) to such of the children of his sister who should attain the age of 21 years in equal shares, and, in default of any such children, to his sister absolutely.

The testator, a newspaper correspondent, was resident in Singapore at the outbreak of the war. Immediately before the occupation of Singapore by the Japanese in February, 1942, he escaped to Java, but nothing was heard from or of him since the capitulation of Java, and by an order of Barnard, J., dated May 7, 1947, the Public Trustee was given leave to swear that the testator's death occurred "on or since Mar. 7, 1942." The will was proved on Oct. 21, 1947. The testator had no issue and left surviving him his widow and his half-sister who had three children (all of whom were still infants, one of them being the testator's godson, St. John Patrick). The other questions asked by the summons were settled by compromise, the compromise being approved by the judge in chambers, as the interests of infant beneficiaries were concerned.

ROXBURGH, J., now held that the legacy given by cl. 3 carried interest as from the date of the death of the testator.

Wilfrid Hunt for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee.

Cross, K.C., for the first defendant, the widow.

Graetz for the other defendants, the testator's half-sister, her husband and three infant children.

ROXBURGH, J. : The question to be decided is whether this legacy carries interest as from the date of the testator's death or only as from the expiration of a year after his death. If the word " maintenance " were to be substituted for the word " education " in cl. 3 of the will, this case would, in effect, be covered by Re Churchill (1). The headnote to that case is :

> " Testatrix by her will devised and bequeathed the residue of her real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert and out of the proceeds to pay certain pecuniary legacies, including a legacy of £200 to her grand-nephew C.P., and she directed that the interest of males under her will should vest at 21 years and of females at that age or marriage. The testatrix empowered her trustees at their discretion ' to apply the whole or any part of the share to which any beneficiary hereunder may be contingently entitled in or towards the advancement in life or otherwise for the benefit of such beneficiary whether male or female and whether under the age of 21 years or not.' The testatrix died in 1908. At the date of her will and the date of her death C.P. was an infant : Held, that interest was payable on the legacy from the death of the testatrix and that the trustees were entitled to apply the interest in or towards the maintenance of C.P. during his infancy."

But it was submitted to me that " education " is in a different category from " maintenance," and there is no authority one way or the other. In Re Churchill (1), the direction was " to apply the whole or any part of the share " to which the legatee might be entitled and it was held that interest was payable from the death of the testatrix. In the present case there is a direction to " use the said sum or any part thereof . . ." In my judgment, the directions in the two cases are sufficiently similar and " education " and " maintenance " are so closely akin that the same principle ought to apply. Accordingly, I will declare that the legacy of £1,000 bequeathed by cl. 3 of the will carries interest as from the death of the testator.

Declaration accordingly.

SMITH AND ANOTHER v. RIVER DOUGLAS CATCHMENT BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), May 24, 25, 26, 27, June 3, 1949.]

Sale of Land—Covenant running with land—Contract with catchment board to widen, deepen and make good banks of river—Bursting of banks—Flooding of adjoining land owned by successor in title to party to contract—Liability of board—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 78 (1).

In 1938, in order to prevent flooding, eleven owners of land through which a river ran, made an agreement with a catchment board whereby the board covenanted to widen, deepen and make good the banks of the river and thereafter to maintain them, the landowners paying a contribution towards the cost. In 1940 the first plaintiff took a conveyance from one of the landowners of her land, which was expressly stated to be conveyed with the benefit of the agreement made in 1938. In 1944 the first plaintiff let the land to the second plaintiff as a yearly tenant. In 1946, when the river was in flood, the banks burst, flooding the plaintiffs' land. In an action by the plaintiffs for breach of contract, the board contended that, if there was a breach, there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the board and that the covenant did not run with the land so as to give the plaintiffs a cause of action.

Held : (i) on the facts, the board had performed the work badly and had broken their implied obligation to use reasonable care and skill in its execution and maintenance.

(ii) on construction the covenant affected the use and per se the value of the lands and showed that the intention of the parties to the agreement of 1938 was that the benefit of the obligation to maintain should attach to the lands into whosesoever hands they came ; the covenant was binding on the board although they were strangers to the conveyance to the first plaintiff ; and, therefore, the covenant was enforceable against the board by the first plaintiff as successor in title of the original landowner, and, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 78 (1), by the second plaintiff as a person deriving title under the first plaintiff.

Dictum of Farwell, J., in Rogers v. Hosegood ([1900] 2 Ch. 395), applied.

(iii) although the deed containing the covenant did not expressly identify the particular land to be benefited the maxim " Id certum est quod certum reddi potest " applied so as to make admissible extrinsic evidence to prove the extent and situation of the lands of the parties to the contract of 1938 ; the land owned and occupied respectively by the plaintiffs was capable of identification ; and, therefore, the board were liable to the plaintiffs.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of MORRIS, J., dated Oct. 15, 1948, in an action for damages for breach of contract and for negligence.

By an agreement under seal dated April 25, 1938, and made between a Mrs. Smith and ten other owners of land adjoining the Eller Brook in the area of the defendant catchment board, the board covenanted to " widen and deepen and make good the banks of the Eller Brook . . . take over the control of the brook and maintain for all time the work when completed." In 1940 Mrs. Smith conveyed her land to the first plaintiff purporting to transfer therewith the benefit of the agreement of 1938. In 1944 the first plaintiff let the land to the second plaintiff, Snipe Hall Farm, Ltd. In 1946, owing to faulty work by the board, the banks burst flooding the plaintiffs' land.

MORRIS, J., held that the contractual obligations of the board were not to be regarded as running with the land, and, therefore, the plaintiffs had no right of action in contract, and, further, following the decision in East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v. Kent (11), the board were not liable in tort. The Court of Appeal now held that the covenant was binding as between the board and the plaintiffs, that the board had been guilty of a breach of the covenant, and that in those circumstances, the question of liability in tort did not arise. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Gerrard, K.C., and Baucher for the plaintiffs.
Nield, K.C., and Youds for the catchment board.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : By an agreement under seal dated Apr. 25, 1938, made between Mrs. Ellen Smith and ten other owners of certain lands situate between the Leeds and Liverpool Canal and the River Douglas and adjoining the Eller

Brook in the parish of Lathom in the county of Lancaster, of the one part, and the defendant board, of the other part, in consideration of the landowners undertaking to pay the sums set out in the schedule to the agreement as contributions towards the cost incurred, or to be incurred, by the board in widening, deepening, improving and maintaining the Eller Brook, the board covenanted to :

> "Replace the present defective outfall from the Low Meadows situate A > near the junction of the Eller Brook with the River Douglas by a new outfall of not less capacity and modern design. (ii) Widen and deepen and make good the banks of the Eller Brook from its junction with the River Douglas to Brook Bridge Carr Lane Burscough. (iii) Take over the control of the brook from its junction with the River Douglas to Brook Bridge Carr Lane Burscough and maintain for all time the work when completed." B

The agreement contains the following recitals :

> "Whereas (1) Certain lands belonging to the parties of the first eleven parts hereto (hereinafter called 'the landlowners') situate between the Leeds and Liverpool Canal and the River Douglas and adjoining the Eller Brook in the parish of Lathom in the county aforesaid are liable to flooding. C
> (2) The board is a drainage board duly constituted under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, and the lands subject to flooding lie within the catchment area of the board. (3) A proposal has been made that the board in order to improve the drainage of the land liable to flood and to prevent future flooding should undertake the widening deepening improvement and future maintenance of the Eller Brook Carr Lane Burscough aforesaid to which the D > board have agreed subject to the landowners paying a proportion of the cost thereof in manner hereinafter appearing. (4) The landowners have agreed to contribute towards the cost of the works to be carried out by the board as hereinafter contained. (5) For the purpose of giving effect hereto the board have applied to the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries to make Eller Brook a 'main river' under the control of the board." E

The consent of the Minister was duly obtained, and the board proceeded with the work of widening, deepening and improving the Eller Brook. The work was carried out on the lines of a plan which had been prepared by Mr. Eaton, the board's engineer, in June, 1934.

On Apr. 1, 1940, the first plaintiff, Smith, took a conveyance from Mrs. Ellen Smith of her land, which was expressly stated to be conveyed with the benefit F of the said agreement of Apr. 25, 1938. By Apr. 12, 1940, the work of cleaning and deepening the brook was practically completed as is shown by the board's minute of that date, which read as follows :

> "Cleaning and deepening of Eller Brook and Wham Ditch. The work on the above brook is practically completed. On Dec. 5 a breach occurred G > in the bank of the Eller Brook, but the flooding that took place was slight, and the breach was closed in a few hours. About 300 acres of land on and adjoining the Low Meadows have been ploughed, and one owner has commenced to build a farm and buildings near Wanes Blades Bridge to better enable him to farm his land."

In May, 1944, the second plaintiffs, Snipes Hall Farm, Ltd., was incorporated, H and it holds the land in question in the present proceedings under an oral agreement as yearly tenant at a rent of £158 5*s*. 0*d*. per annum. Some 250 acres of land were brought under cultivation by these plaintiffs prior to the flooding which gave rise to this action. The minute of Apr. 12, 1940, recorded a breach in the bank of the Eller Brook on Dec. 9, 1939. Further and more serious breaches occurred in January, 1944, February, 1945, and on Sept. 1 and 2, 1946. It is in respect of the damage suffered on this last occasion when the plaintiffs' lands were flooded to a depth of over five feet that this action was brought.

In so far as the plaintiffs' claim is based on breach of contract, it is alleged that, by the agreement of Apr. 25, 1938, the board agreed for a monetary consideration to execute certain works and to maintain for all time the work when completed, and that, there being no specification incorporated in the agreement, there was an implied obligation on the part of the board to use reasonable care and skill in the execution and maintenance of the work having regard to the purpose for which it was required. It is said, and I do not think this was contested, that the duty of the board under this contract, voluntarily entered into for a monetary consideration, is not to be measured by the standard to be taken for the purpose of ascertaining its liability in tort in the performance of its statutory powers under the Land Drainage Act, 1930. Its duty is, accordingly, not limited to avoiding the creation of new danger or damage in the performance of work which it had the power, but was under no duty, to carry out. Nor can it be relevant in this connection to consider the financial resources of the board or its other commitments. The board must be presumed to have taken all these matters into account before it fixed the contributions to be paid by the landowners as consideration for its undertaking to perform the work and maintain it for all time. Therefore, it is clear that the plaintiffs are right in their contention as to the measure of the board's duty under the contract.

I pass, therefore, to consider whether the plaintiffs established a breach of this duty. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and continued :] Having regard to the effect of the evidence to which I have referred, it appears to me to be clear that the board were in breach of their contractual duty. I am not clear what, in the learned judge's view, was the measure of the board's obligations under the contract, but he appears to have absolved it from liability on the ground that it was not trifling with the situation or heedless or inactive. However this may be, I think that on the undisputed evidence and the judge's findings the board were in breach under the contract, and that such breach caused the damage complained of.

It remains to consider whether, in these circumstances, the plaintiffs, or either of them, can sue in respect of this breach. It is said for the board that the benefit of the covenant does not run with the land so as to bind a stranger who has not and never had an interest in the land to be benefited and there being no servient tenement to bear the burden. Further it is contended that such a covenant must by the terms of the deed in which it is contained relate to some specific parcel of land, the precise extent and situation of which can be identified by reference to the deed alone. It is first necessary to ascertain from the deed that the covenant is one which " touches or concerns " the land, that is, it must either affect the land as regards mode of occupation or it must be such as per se, and not merely from collateral circumstances, affects the value of the land, and it must then be shown that it was the intention of the parties that the benefit thereof should run with the land. The deed shows that its object was to improve the drainage of land liable to flooding and prevent future flooding. The location of the land is described as situate between the Leeds and Liverpool Canal and the River Douglas and adjoining the Eller Brook. In return for lump sum payments the board covenants to do certain work to the banks of the Eller Brook, one of such banks being, in fact, situate upon and forming part of the plaintiffs' lands, and to maintain for all time the work when completed. In my view, the language of the deed satisfies both tests. It affects the value of the land per se and converts it from flooded meadows to land suitable for agriculture, and shows an intention that the benefit of the obligation to maintain shall attach thereto into whosesoever hands the lands shall come.

With regard to the covenantor being a stranger, The Prior's Case (1) is referred to in Spencer's Case (2) in these words as set out in Smith's Leading Cases (13th ed., vol. 1, p. 55) :

> [In the case of a] grandfather, father and two sons : The grandfather being seised of the manor of D, whereof a chapel was parcel : a prior, with the assent of his convent, by deed covenanted for him and his successors, with the grandfather and his heirs, that he and his convent would sing all the week in his chapel, parcel of the said manor, for the lords of the said manor and his servants, etc. ; the grandfather did enfeoff one of the manor in fee, who gave it to the younger son and his wife in tail ; and it was adjudged that the tenants in tail, as terre-tenants (for the elder brother was heir), should have an action of covenant against the prior, for the covenant is to do a thing which is annexed to the chapel, which is within the manor, and so annexed to the manor, as it is there said."

The notes to Spencer's case (2) in Smith's Leading Cases, at p. 73, state :

> " When such a covenant [namely, covenants running with the land made with the owner of the land to which they relate] is made, it seems to be of no consequence whether the covenantor be the person who conveyed the land to the covenantee, or be a mere stranger."

In vol. 5 of Bythewood & Jarman's Conveyancing, 4th ed., p. 268, the following passage from the third report of the Real Property Commissioners is quoted with approval :

> " Expressions found in some books would lead to the opinion, that, in considering this class of covenant with reference to the benefit of them, there is a distinction between those cases where the covenantor is a party by whom the estate is, or has been, conveyed, and those in which he is a stranger to the estate. We think the authority of Lord Coke on this point (which is express (Co. Litt. 384*b*)) sufficient to warrant us in disregarding this distinction."

In Rogers v. Hosegood (3) Farwell, J., in a passage where he refers, among others, to The Prior's Case (1)—and I quote from his judgment because, although the case went to the Court of Appeal, the Court of Appeal had to deal with a rather different point—after stating what are the requirements in order that the covenant may run with the land, says ([1900] 2 Ch. 395) :

> " It is not contended that the covenants in question in this case have not the first characteristic, but it is said that they fail in the second. I am of opinion that they possess both. Adopting the definition of Bayley, J., in Congleton Corpn. v. Pattison (4) the covenant must either affect the land as regards mode of occupation, or it must be such as per se, and not merely from collateral circumstances, affects the value of the land. It is to my mind obvious that the value of Sir J. Millais's land is directly increased by the covenants in question. If authority is needed, I would refer to Mann v. Stephens (5), a case very similar to the present ; Vyvyan v. Arthur (6) ; The Prior's Case (1) ; Fleetwood v. Hull (7) ; White v. Southend Hotel Co. (8). I see no difficulty in holding that the benefit of a covenant runs with the land of the covenantee, while the burden of the same covenant does not run with the land of the covenantor."

In this state of the authorities it seems clear, despite some dicta tending to the contrary view, that such a covenant, if it runs with the land, is binding on the covenantor though a mere stranger, and that this point will not avail the board.

As to the requirement that the deed containing the covenant must expressly identify the particular land to be benefited, no authority was cited to us and in the absence of such authority I can see no valid reason why the maxim " Id certum est quod certum reddi potest " should not apply so as to make admissible extrinsic evidence to prove the extent and situation of the lands of the respective landowners adjoining the Eller Brook situate between the Leeds and Liverpool Canal and the River Douglas. On this part of the case MORRIS, J., said :

> " In my judgment, the contractual obligations of the board are not to be regarded as covenants running with the land. They do not differ from obligations which by agreement a firm of contractors might agree to discharge in reference to some particular land. The catchment board do not own any land and there is no question of any obligation in relation to or connection with any land of theirs. The circumstances are different from those in Shayler v. Woolf (9). Section 78 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, does not affect the question as to what are covenants relating to the land of a covenantee. Furthermore, much of the reasoning of LINDLEY, L.J., in Austerberry v. Oldham Corpn. (10) (1885) (29 Ch.D. 780, 781) is applicable. Although work might have to be done on the land which formerly belonged to Mrs. Ellen Smith, and now belongs to the first plaintiff, equally it might be that for the effectual preventing of flooding of Low Meadows work on the banks of Eller Brook at some place considerably higher up the Brook might have to be undertaken."

I do not find anything in the judgments in Austerberry v. Oldham Corpn. (10) which conflicts with the law as I have endeavoured to set it out above, and I have, accordingly, arrived at the conclusion that the covenant by the board in the agreement of April 25, 1938, is one which runs with the land referred to therein, which land is capable of identification, and that it is binding on the board ; and, further, that by virtue of s. 78 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, it can be enforced at the suit of the covenantee and her successors in title and the persons deriving title under her or them so that both the plaintiff Smith and the plaintiff company can sue in respect of the damage resulting to their respective interests therein by reason of the board's breach of covenant. For these reasons, I would allow this appeal, and remit the assessment of damages to an official referee.

Having regard to the conclusion I have reached on the contractual aspect of the case, I find it unnecessary to express any view with regard to the application of the principles laid down in East Suffolk Catchment Board v. Kent (11) to the work carried out by the board had it been performed solely in the exercise of its statutory powers and in the absence of the agreement of April, 1938.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : The plaintiffs claimed in contract and in tort for damages done by floods in the early part of September, 1946, caused by water flowing through a breach made in the walls containing a stream or river known as the Eller Brook. The learned judge held that the claim under both heads failed. He considered first the claim in tort. I have come to the conclusion that the claim in contract succeeds, and on that view it is unnecessary to consider the claim in tort.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] The first question is : What was the obligation of the board under the agreement ? They had, in my opinion, to construct banks which might reasonably be expected both by their height and their strength to prevent flooding. The construction of such a bank was the purpose for which the landowners paid their money. If they had been told that the bank to be constructed was one doomed to failure in the event of floods, or a bad bank under any conditions, they would presumably have kept their money for some other more useful purpose. The phrase " doomed to failure " was one used of the outer banks as constructed by Mr. Waters, one of the plaintiffs' witnesses. The learned judge saw no reason to doubt the general reliability of Mr. Waters and of Mr. Ashcroft, the other witness on this subject for the plaintiffs. That does not mean he accepted everything they said. The evidence on both sides as to these banks can be shortly summarised. Mr. Ashcroft said the outer banks had no reasonable chance of standing up to their work. Mr. Waters regarded the banks as inadequate, as doomed to failure. So far as the board are concerned, when there was a burst in January, 1944, a statement appears in their minutes that "the bank is a bad one under any conditions." Mr. Eaton, the board's engineer, agreed with that. He said of the work when originally done : "I knew it was dangerous," he adds, "but I was well satisfied with what we had done." He assented to a leading question put by counsel for the board that the bank was the best that could be produced with the money available. The question of the financial resources of the board seems to me to have little or no relevance to their liability under the agreement. If a party, whether a catchment board or an individual, undertakes for consideration to produce a certain result it is no answer if a claim is based on his failure to produce that result for him to show that he had not the money. Everyone was agreed that with extra expense a reasonably strong bank could have been constructed. This is in fact now being done.

If I have rightly construed the contract, then, in my view, there was on this evidence as accepted by the learned judge a breach. The judge held that whatever might be the liability under the agreement the plaintiffs could not sue on it. It was not, therefore, necessary for him to deal in detail with the question of breach. He expresses his opinion that there was no breach, but I think that this was on the basis of a different construction of the contract. If, therefore, Mrs. Ellen Smith had remained in possession, she could have recovered damages. Does the covenant run with the land so that the first plaintiff can sue on it ? If the answer to this is "Yes," has s. 78 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, enabled the second plaintiffs to sue in that that section covers not only successors in title of the covenantee but persons deriving title under successors in title ? We are concerned here with the question whether the benefit of a covenant runs with the land benefited as against the original covenantor. The learned judge said this :

> "In my judgment, the contractual obligations of the board are not to be regarded as covenants running with the land. They do not differ from obligations which by agreement a firm of contractors might agree to discharge in reference to some particular land."

In the ordinary case a firm of contractors who had undertaken to construct and thereafter maintain certain works would receive for the latter service an annual sum. Such a contract clearly would not run with the land so as to bind a transferee to continue to pay the annual sum. The board also differs from a firm of contractors, in that they have a statutory power to do such work as is in question here on other people's land. If one seeks the intention of the parties in the agreement, I should have thought it was plain that the benefit of the covenant was intended to run with the land. If it was not, a landowner who sold a month after the agreement had no legal right which he could transfer and claim value for. If one assumes a single landowner who transferred the land, the board having taken his money would be under no liability to the transferee, and I do not see how the transferor could establish any damage. The undertaking is to maintain "for all time the work when completed," and not to maintain "so long as you remain owner." In Rogers v. Hosegood (3), Farwell, J., said ([1900] 2 Ch. 395) :

> "Covenants which run with the land must have the following characteristics : (1) they must be made with a covenantee who has an interest in the land to which they refer ; (2) they must concern or touch the land."

Both these conditions seem to me to be satisfied. The learned judge goes on to say that in addition there must be an intention that the covenant should so run. I have already dealt with this.

It is said, rightly, that the land intended to be protected must be described so as to be ascertainable with reasonable accuracy. It was submitted that it was not so described in the present case. It is true that evidence outside the instrument itself would be necessary to show what were the parcels covered by the agreement. This was true of the agreement in Rogers v. Hosegood (3) where the covenant was with named owners (a partnership) . . . " to all or any of their lands adjoining or near to the said premises." There are many cases in which the lands to be benefited are not identified by descriptions with reference to a map or plan.

There is another point. What is the scope of the covenant ? Suppose the breach through which A's land was damaged occurred in the banks where they run through B's lands, can A sue ? In my view, he could. Under the agreement the lands to be drained and protected are treated as a unit, though, of course, not in single ownership. The covenant as to widening and deepening is clearly a covenant with each owner that the brook will be widened and deepened throughout the whole length covered by the agreement and not merely that portion of the brook which adjoins his lands.

On the question whether the covenant ran with the land, counsel for the board submitted that if the benefit of a covenant is to run with the land it must either be with a previous owner or as against the owner of another parcel. The authorities do not seem to me to support these propositions. Counsel also relied on Formby v. Barker (12). That was dealing with a different point. In that case a vendor had parted with the whole of his land, the purchaser agreeing to restrict its user. The vendor's executor sought to enforce the covenant. It was held that the covenant was personal and the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay (13) inapplicable. In that case, the vendor having parted with all his land, there was no land with which the benefit of the covenant could run. The sentences on which counsel relied must be read with regard to the type of covenant with which the case was concerned. On the basis that the benefit of the covenant ran with the land, counsel did not argue that the cause of action was restricted to the first plaintiff. I, therefore, think that the appeal should be allowed, and that the claim based on the agreement succeeds. It is unnecessary to consider what would have been the position if the plaintiffs had had no contract to rely on. The learned judge considered that the claim would have failed on the principles laid down in East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v. Kent (11). Various questions might have arisen. Was there a failure to take reasonable or ordinary care ? Does the main principle in the East Suffolk case (11) apply where damage is caused by a negligent defect in works constructed ? If any duty was owed to the plaintiffs it might well be less onerous than the duty which the board assumed under the contract. Was the danger to the plaintiffs' land increased or diminished, or increased in some respects and diminished in others ? I express no opinion on these points beyond saying that the issues raised would, in my opinion, have not been easy.

DENNING, L.J., stated the facts and continued : This action is brought by the second plaintiffs, the tenants of the field, against the board to recover the value of the crops they have lost. The first plaintiff, the present owner, joins in the action claiming his loss of rent, but the substantial claim is by the tenants. It is my opinion that the board broke their contract. It was an implied term that they should do the work with reasonable care and skill so as to make the banks reasonably fit for the purpose of preventing flooding. The proper way of doing this, according to the experts, was to put a clay core in the banks, or to make them very much wider, but they did not do either. It may be that the board had not sufficient funds available to carry out such works, but that seems to me to be an irrelevant consideration, or, at any rate, just as irrelevant in the case of a public board as in the case of a private contractor. No private contractor who was engaged to make works for a specific purpose could excuse himself for bad results by saying that he had not sufficient money to erect proper works. It follows, therefore, that if the original landowner with whom the agreement was made had himself cultivated the fields and suffered damage by the breach he could recover from the board, but he sold the land and he has suffered no damage. The damage has been suffered partly by the first plaintiff, the man who purchased the land, but principally by the tenants, the second plaintiffs, and the question is whether the second plaintiffs can sue on the contract.

Counsel for the board says that the plaintiffs cannot sue. He says that there is no privity of contract between them and the board, and that it is a fundamental principle that no one can sue on a contract to which he is not a party. That argument can be met either by admitting the principle and saying that it does not apply to this case, or by disputing the principle itself. I make so bold as to dispute it. The principle is not nearly so fundamental as it is sometimes supposed to be. It did not become rooted in our law until the year 1861 (Tweddle v. Atkinson (14)) and reached its full growth in 1915 (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co., Ltd. v. Selfridge & Co., Ltd. (15)). It has never been able entirely to supplant another principle whose roots go much deeper. I mean the principle that a man who makes a deliberate promise which is intended to be binding, that is to say, under seal or for good consideration, must keep his promise ; and the court will hold him to it, not only at the suit of the party who gave the consideration, but also at the suit of one who was not a party to the contract, provided that it was made for his benefit and that he has a sufficient interest to entitle him to enforce it, subject always, of course, to any defences that may be open on the merits. It is on this principle, implicit if not expressed, (i) that the courts ever since 1368 have held that a covenant made with the owner of land for its benefit can be enforced against the covenantor, not only by the original party, but also by his successors in title : see The Prior's Case (1) which is set out by Lord Coke in his work on Littleton, at p. 384*a*, and in his report of Spencer's case (2) : in Smith's Leading Cases, 13th ed., p. 55 ; (ii) that the courts of common law in the 17th and 18th centuries repeatedly enforced promises expressly made in favour of an interested person : see Dutton v. Poole (16), approved by Lord Mansfield in Martyn v. Hind (17) ; (iii) that Lord Mansfield held that an undisclosed principal is entitled to sue on a contract made by his agent for his benefit, even though nothing was said about agency in the contract : see Rabone v. Williams (18), cited in George v. Clagett (19) ; and (iv) that Lord Hardwicke, L.C., decided that a third person is entitled to sue if there can be spelt out of the contract an intention by one of the parties to contract as trustee for him, even though nothing was said about any trust in the contract, and there was no trust fund to be administered : see Tomlinson v. Gill (20). Throughout the history of the principle the difficulty has been, of course, to say what is sufficient interest to entitle the third person to recover. It has sometimes been supposed that there must always be something in the nature of a "trust" for his benefit: see Vandepitte v. Preferred Accident Insurance Corpn. of New York (21) ([1933] A.C. 79), but this is an elusive test which does not explain all the cases, and it involves the trustee being made a nominal party to the action either as plaintiff or defendant, unless that formality is dispensed with, as it was in Les Affrcteurs Réunis Société Anonyme v. Leopold Walford (London), Ltd. (22). The truth is that the principle is not so limited. It may be difficult to define what is a sufficient interest. While it does not include the maintenance of prices to the public disadvantage, it does cover the protection of the legitimate property, rights and interests of the third person, although no agency or trust for him can be inferred. It covers, therefore, rights such as the following which cannot justly be denied—the right of a seller to enforce a commercial credit issued in his favour by a bank under contract with the buyer ; the right of a widow to sue for a pension which her husband's employers promised to pay her under contract with him : see Dutton v. Poole (16) and cf. Re Schebsman (23) ([1943] 2 All

E.R. 779) ; or the right of a man's servants and guests to claim on an insurance policy, taken out by him against loss by burglary, which is expressed to cover them : cf. Prudential Staff Union v. Hall (24) ([1947] K.B. 689, 690). In some cases the legislature itself has intervened, as, for instance, to give the driver of a motor car the right to sue on an insurance policy taken out by the owner which is expressed to cover the driver, but this does not mean that the common law
A would not have reached the same result by itself.

The particular application of the principle with which we are concerned here is the case of covenants made with the owner of the land to which they relate. The law on this subject was fully expounded by Mr. Smith in his note to Spencer's Case (1) which has always been regarded as authoritative. Such covenants are clearly intended, and usually expressed, to be for the benefit of whomsoever
B should be the owner of the land for the time being ; and at common law each successive owner has a sufficient interest to sue because he holds the same estate as the original owner. The reason which LORD COKE gave for this rule is the reason which underlies the whole of the principle now under consideration. He said in his work on LITTLETON (p. 385 a) that it was " to give damages to the party grieved." If a successor in title were not allowed to sue it would mean that
C the covenantor could break his contract with impunity, for it is clear that the original owner, after he had parted with the land, could recover no more than nominal damages for any breach that occurred thereafter. It was always held, however, at common law that, in order that a successor in title should be entitled to sue, he must be of the same estate as the original owner. That alone was a sufficient interest to entitle him to enforce the contract. The
D covenant was supposed to be made for the benefit of the owner and his successors in title, and not for the benefit of anyone else. This limitation, however, was, as is pointed out in SMITH'S LEADING CASES, p. 75, capable of being " productive of very serious and disagreeable consequences," and it has been removed by s. 78 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which provides that a covenant relating to any land of the covenantee shall be deemed to be made with the covenantee and
E his successors in title " and the person deriving title under him or them " and shall have effect as if such successors " and other persons " were expressed. The covenant of the catchment board in the present case clearly relates to the land of the covenantees. It was a covenant to do work on the land for the benefit of the land. By the statute, therefore, it is to be deemed to be made, not only with the original owner, but also with the purchasers of the land and
F their tenants as if they were expressed. Now, if they were expressed, it would be clear that the covenant was made for their benefit, and they clearly have sufficient interest to entitle them to enforce it because they have suffered the damage. The result is that the plaintiffs come within the principle whereby a person interested can sue on a contract expressly made for his benefit.

I would not wish to leave this subject without referring also to s. 56 (1) of the G Law of Property Act, 1925, which provides :

> " A person may take . . . the benefit of any . . . covenant or agreement over or respecting land or other property, although he may not be named as a party to the . . . instrument."

That section is, no doubt, as SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said in H White v. Bijou Mansions, Ltd. (25) ([1938] 1 All E.R. 554), confined to cases when the person seeking to take advantage of it is a person " within the benefit " of the covenant or agreement, but, subject to that limitation, there is no reason why the section should not be given its full scope, just as LORD DUNEDIN was prepared to give full scope to its narrower predecessor, s. 5 of the Real Property Act, 1845 : see Dyson v. Forster (26) ([1909] A.C. 103). Section 56 means, therefore, that a person may enforce an agreement respecting property made for his benefit, although he was not a party to it. So construed it is a clear statutory recognition of the principle to which I have referred and it is applicable to this case. If the principle had been canvassed in Re Miller's Agreement (27), it should, I think, have been held there that the daughters had a right at common law to sue for their pension, a right which was reinforced by s. 56. I cannot believe that the covenantors there could break their contract with impunity.

So much for the question of principle. Counsel for the board did urge that the benefit of the covenant should not run with the land here because there was no clearly defined piece of land to which it was attached. It is true that the agreement did not describe the lands by metes and bounds, but it did give a description of them which was capable of being rendered certain by extrinsic evidence, and that is sufficient. Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. Counsel also argued that there was no servient tenement, but that is only material when there is a question whether the burden of a covenant runs with the land. This is a question of the benefit running, and ever since The Prior's Case (1) it has been held that the covenantor is liable because of his covenant given to the owner of the dominant tenement and not because of his relationship to any servient tenement

In my opinion, therefore, the board are liable to the plaintiffs in damages for breach of covenant. It is thus unnecessary to consider whether they are liable in tort, but I will add a word about it. The decision of the House of Lords in the East Suffolk case (11) shows that, in the absence of a contract, a catchment board is under no duty to exercise its powers with efficiency or despatch or at all, but it also shows that, if it does exercise its powers, it must use reasonable care not to injure persons likely to be affected by its operations. The present case is very different from that one, because here the landowners, in consequence of the works done by the board, ploughed up the land and cultivated the fields, and in the result suffered damage which they would not have done if the board had done nothing, for in that case they would have had no crops there. But the decision of the House of Lords does show, however, that, in considering whether the board broke its duty in tort, it is material to inquire into the expense of the works which it is said they ought to have constructed. An adjacent landowner must not be too critical if the board prefers thrift to efficiency, I suppose on the principle that he should not look a gift horse in the mouth, and must be prepared to take it with some faults, but the duty in contract is a very different thing. There is no question of a gift horse there. The landowner paid his contribution in return for the board's promise, and they are in duty bound to fulfil it. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

JENNINGS v. COLE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), May 31, June 1, 1949.]

Negligence—Invitee—Duty of occupier—Unusual danger—Neighbour entering premises at request of occupier to tend occupier's bedridden wife—Fall and injury to leg.

The occupier of a house, having to go to work, asked a neighbour to go into the house from time to time to look after his wife, who was bedridden. The neighbour slipped on a landing and injured her leg.

HELD: as the occupier of the house had a material interest in having the neighbour on the premises, the neighbour was an invitee, and, therefore, had her injuries been caused by any unusual danger on the premises of which the occupier knew or ought to have known, the occupier would have been liable, but, on the facts, no unusual danger existed.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The plaintiff was injured as a result of an accident on the defendant's premises which she was visiting in order to look after the defendant's wife who was bedridden. She claimed to have been an invitee to the premises and to have suffered her injury through an unusual danger, having slipped on a rug placed on a floor which was said to have been highly polished. LYNSKEY, J., held that the plaintiff was an invitee, but on the facts he held that the accident had not arisen from any unusual danger.

Pearl for the plaintiff.

Jukes for the defendant.

LYNSKEY, J.: Doris Edith Jennings, who is the wife of Leonard Edward Jennings, claims damages for injury in respect of an accident which occurred to her on Jan. 11, 1946. Her claim is that she visited the defendant's premises on that date as an invitee, and, while there, she slipped on a rug which had been placed on a floor which was highly polished, whereby she sustained injuries to her ankle and leg. Counsel for the defendant suggests, first, that she was not an invitee but a licensee, and, secondly, that, if she was an invitee, there was no unusual danger on these premises and that the accident was not caused by any negligence on the part of the defendant.

The plaintiff and the defendant are next door neighbours at Greenway, Southgate. The plaintiff lives at 60, Greenway, and the defendant at 58, and they have lived in these houses and been friendly for many years. In September, 1945, the defendant's wife, Mrs. Cole, became ill. Her condition gradually got worse, and shortly after Christmas, 1945, she became entirely bedridden and she died in the following month. The defendant was a master tailor and had to go out to his work. As no one else was living in the house with him and his wife, he arranged that the charwoman should come every morning on five days a week soon after nine o'clock and remain until noon and that his sister-in-law should come as early as she could in the afternoon, which was not until after two o'clock, to look after Mrs. Cole. The defendant himself came home to attend to his wife whenever it was possible, but on the days when he could not get home there was a gap between twelve and two o'clock when there was nobody to look after her. Therefore, according to the plaintiff, she was asked by the defendant to go in to look after his wife whenever she could. She said that she was asked many times and pressed to do it both by the defendant and his wife. The defendant himself says that the plaintiff was asked from time to time to go in to look after his wife, and he went on to say:

> "I asked Mrs. Jennings to come in and be with Mrs. Cole when she was ill. I asked Mrs. Jennings to come in when she could. I did not ask her to come in on the particular day when the accident occurred."

In re-examination, in answer to his own counsel, as to what he would expect Mrs. Jennings to do when she came in, he said:

> "I would expect her to see if my wife wanted anything, and to make her comfortable."

It is said by the defendant that the relationship between the parties was purely social, that the plaintiff went to do what she could for his wife out of Christian charity and social obligation, and that she was simply there as a social guest, and, therefore, in the position of a licensee. The plaintiff contends that she was there at the request of the defendant to assist him. Many tests have been applied as to what is the distinction between "licensee" and "invitee." It seems to me that a request was made by the defendant to the plaintiff to go into his house to see if his wife wanted anything, and, if she did, to do it for her, and also to comfort her and assist her when no one else was available. Applying the test of material interest, the defendant, in my view, had a material interest in having the plaintiff on the premises to look after his wife while she was incapacitated from looking after herself. That being so, the plaintiff entered the premises as an invitee and not as a licensee.

The law to be applied has been repeated many times, and appears in Indermaur v. Dames (1) in the judgment of Willes, J., where he said (L.R. 1 C.P. 288):

> ". . . with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law, that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know; and that, where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken, by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as matter of fact."

Applying that test in this case, the first question is whether there was unusual danger. The plaintiff says that the landing on the first floor of the defendant's premises, outside Mrs. Cole's bedroom, was covered with linoleum polished to a very high degree. She says there was a rug which measured 3 ft. 11 ins. long and 3 ft. 2 ins. wide, which usually rested opposite the gas-fire in Mrs. Cole's bedroom, but which, on the day in question, for some unexplained reason had been taken from that position and placed on the landing on this highly polished surface. Mrs. Jennings went into the premises at about one o'clock, taking with her a junket which she had prepared for Mrs. Cole, and went across the landing to the bedroom. She says she did not notice that the rug was there, and when she had put one foot on its edge the rug slipped and she fell and suffered a fracture of the fibula. If that was an account which I could accept, it would show the existence of an unusual danger, but the case for the defendant was that this rug was put in this position on the landing some time before 1939 and had been there since and that the landing was not highly polished under the rug, but only polished round it. I am satisfied that the floor was polished round, and not underneath, the rug, and that the plaintiff had been coming to these premises regularly for years and even more often during the period just before her accident. I am satisfied that she knew exactly what the conditions were. I am not satisfied that a rug in a position like that is an unusual danger in a house. I am satisfied that the plaintiff fell, but how she fell I do not know—whether she tripped on the rug or whether she was turning quickly to go from the front bedroom to the back bedroom. People do slip on carpets and rugs, and A even on linoleum which has been highly polished. I am not satisfied here there was any unusual danger of which the defendant knew or ought to have known or for which he was in any way to blame. The result is there will be judgment for the defendant.

Negligence—Invitee—Duty of occupier—Unusual danger—Person visiting railway station to meet passenger—Oily patch on platform.

The plaintiff went to a railway terminus belonging to the defendants to meet his daughter and her family who were arriving there by train. D As he walked along the platform at which the train had arrived looking into each compartment for his daughter, he slipped on an oily patch which he had not seen and fell, sustaining injury. He now claimed damages for negligence. It was found as a fact that the oily patch ought not to have been there, and that, if the defendants' servants had taken proper care, it could have been removed or rendered innocuous to persons on the E platform.

HELD: (i) inasmuch as it was a convenience to their passengers, and as the plaintiff, by assisting with the luggage of the persons whom he had come to meet, would help to clear the platform, the defendants had an interest in the plaintiff's entering the station which was sufficient to make the plaintiff an invitee.

ACTION for damages for negligence. A

The plaintiff's daughter and her husband and children were travelling from Cornwall to London and the train was due to arrive at Paddington Station at 5 p.m. on Tuesday, Mar. 30, 1948. The plaintiff and his wife had taken their car to the station to meet the daughter and her family and to take them to the address a short distance away at which they were to stay. After consulting the platform indicator they went to the proper platform, and the plaintiff, B while walking along the platform after the train had come in, looking into compartments and watching the passengers walking towards him, slipped on a patch of oily substance which might have come from boxes of fish which had been unloaded from trains at that platform on the morning of the same day. The plaintiff fell and was injured. Some of the fish boxes had been loaded on to open trucks from which water, slime and oil could have got on to the C platform. After the unloading of the fish trains, water and other liquids had been removed from the platform by means of squeegees, the whole length of the platform had been swept by three sweepers, and wet or damp patches remaining had been sanded over by three porters with a fine sand. LYNSKEY, J., found as a fact that, if this practice had been carried out efficiently on the day in question, there would have been no patch containing an oily substance D to afford a danger to the plaintiff. He also found that, as forty porters received every train, the Railway Executive had ample opportunity of knowing that the patch was there and of removing it or rendering it innocuous to passengers before the plaintiff was injured. He held that the patch should not have been there, that the plaintiff was an invitee, and that the Railway Executive were liable to him for negligence in not protecting him against an unusual danger. E

Dare for the plaintiff.

Humfrey Edmunds for the defendants, the Railway Executive.

LYNSKEY, J. [having stated the facts]: The question arises whether in those circumstances the Railway Executive are liable and that depends to some degree, though not entirely, on the legal question whether the plaintiff F when visiting these premises did so as a licensee or an invitee. What is an invitee and what is a licensee has been considered many times and I suppose the best definition of invitee is that of LORD BUCKMASTER in Fairman v. Perpetual Investment Building Society (1) ([1923] A.C. 80)—that an invitee is a person who enters on the premises by the permission of the occupier granted in a matter in which the occupier has himself some business or material interest. He is a person G who receives permission from the occupier as a matter of business and not as a matter of grace. Did the plaintiff enter this station for the purposes of the occupier? Did he receive permission from the occupier as a matter of business and not as a matter of grace? One has to be satisfied, first, that he received an invitation or was given permission to be on the premises, but no direct evidence has been led as to that. I have been requested to exercise the general knowledge H which I have, if not as a judge, as a jury, of what happens at large railway termini, particularly at Paddington Station. It is clear that the Railway Executive do permit persons to go into their stations both to see people off and to welcome people on arrival. In most of the large railway stations, and particularly at Paddington, they provide an indicator announcing the arrival of trains so as to indicate to people on the premises to which platform they should go to meet any particular train which is coming in. Also people may take platform tickets for the privilege of going on departure platforms, thus becoming contractors with the Railway Executive.

I am satisfied that the Railway Executive do invite anybody who desires to go and meet persons coming off trains, particularly to help them with their luggage, to do so. In my view, the Railway Executive had an interest in the plaintiff's going on their premises. It was, first of all, a convenience to their passengers. It was also an assistance to the Railway Executive because he would help to carry the passengers' luggage and so to clear the platform. In my view, therefore, there was sufficient interest between the plaintiff and the Railway Executive to make him an invitee for that purpose. I am confirmed in that view by the judgment of DENMAN, J., in Watkins v. Great Western Ry. Co. (2). There a mother was accompanying her daughter to the train. She had taken a ticket for her daughter. She was not going to travel herself, but she was going to see her daughter off, and while going along the platform for that purpose she walked into a plank on which a porter was standing and sustained injuries. The Divisional Court did not agree as to facts, nor as to the result, but in stating the law DENMAN, J., said (37 L.T. 195):

> "The question then arises whether the plaintiff in the present case was in the same position as the plaintiff in the case of Bolch v. Smith (3), as a mere licensee, or whether any other such relation existed as to deprive the defendants of the right to rely upon the doctrine there relied upon. I am of opinion that a railway company, keeping open a bridge over their line for the use of their passengers, is bound to keep that bridge reasonably safe, and that if in practice the friends of passengers are allowed by the company's servants to see passengers off by the trains, and to cross the bridge without asking special permission, the duty of the company in that respect cannot be put down towards them otherwise than it is towards those whom they accompany for such not unreasonable purpose. I think that this view is consistent with the cases of Corby v. Hill (4), and Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co. (5). I regard the passenger's friend so permitted to go along the bridge by constant acquiescence on the part of the railway company as not being in the nature of a person barely licensed to be there, but as being invited to go to the same extent as the passenger whom he accompanies, and is there on lawful business in which the passenger and the company have both an interest."

Applying the reasoning of that statement to the facts of the present case, it seems to me that, where a father of a girl who is travelling goes to meet her to collect her luggage and help her out of the station, he is there on exactly the same terms as the person who has got a ticket to travel. He is there as an invitee. The Railway Executive have a common interest with him in his being there, and in those circumstances they owe him the duty owed by an invitor to an invitee.

That duty has been often stated, and, in particular, by WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (6) ((1866) L.R. 1 C.P. 287). The duty is (the invitee taking reasonable care for his own safety) to prevent damage to the invitee from any unusual danger of which the occupier knew or ought to have known. It seems to me that this was an unusual danger. When using a railway platform one does not expect to find patches of slippery substance which cause one to fall. It is in general unusual to find them there, but the test of what is unusual is, as I held in Horton v. London Graving Dock Co. (7) (p. 169, ante):

> " . . . the only duty imposed on the invitor, or occupier, is to prevent damage from unusual danger . . . Is it danger unusual generally, or is it danger unusual in premises of the type, description and use, to which the invitation is extended, or is it a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee, regard being had to the type, description and > use of the premises to which he has been invited ? In my view, ' unusual danger ' means a danger unusual from the point of view of the particular invitee . . ."

It is said by counsel for the Railway Executive that this could not be an unusual danger because it was an obvious danger. If the thing is obvious it is not unusual to the person who has seen it, but it may be unusual to a person who has not seen it even although he could have seen it if acting reasonably A and taking reasonable care for his own protection. What is acting reasonably must depend on the circumstances of each case. If one is walking along a dockside where one expects mooring ropes and other obstructions one must watch every step, but if one is walking down a railway platform provided for the purpose of those who use the trains one is entitled to expect that it will be free from obstruction. It would not be reasonable to require that those using B the platforms should be looking down at the ground at every step they take. If one were expected to be looking at one's feet when a train comes in one would often not get a seat in one of the crowded compartments. It is not reasonable to ask people to watch every step they take. One must expect them to be looking about—looking at and meeting passengers coming off the train. Anyone who has been caught in the rush of a crowded train arriving C at Paddington Station shortly after a holiday can realise the difficulties of trying to watch every yard of the way when walking against the stream of the traffic. In my view, this patch on the platform was an unusual danger and the plaintiff was acting reasonably in the look-out he was keeping. In the circumstances it was an unusual danger to him, and the Railway Executive were in breach of the duty they owed to him. He was not guilty of contributory D negligence, and, therefore, he is entitled to have damages for the injury he has sustained as a result of their breach of duty.

SYDENHAM v. SYDENHAM AND ILLINGWORTH.

Divorce—Maintenance—Assessment—Factors to be considered—Conduct of parties —Guidance by trial judge—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (1). G

By the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (1) : " The court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the court H may deem to be reasonable . . ."

A husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of adultery, asking for the discretion of the court. By her answer the wife admitted the act of adultery, but pleaded that it was condoned, and she also asked for a divorce on the adultery confessed to by the husband in his discretion statement. Although the commissioner found that the husband had not condoned his wife's adultery, he refused to grant him a decree, and, exercising his discretion in favour of the wife, granted a decree to her. On appeal by both parties the Court of Appeal held that each spouse was entitled to a decree.

Per Denning, L.J. : Though nominally concerned with other matters this appeal is in fact only concerned with the question of maintenance. Under the present practice of the Divorce Court maintenance under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (1), is not awarded on the making of a decree as the statute provides, but at a later stage by the registrar. If a decree is pronounced in a wife's favour she is in a strong position to get maintenance even though she has committed adultery. Similarly a guilty husband granted a decree is usually able to resist a claim for maintenance unless a compassionate allowance is granted. The form of decree may be misleading and no real guide to the conduct of the parties or the merits of the claim. The current phrase whereby it is said the court exercises its discretion " in favour of " one side only means that it is exercising its discretion to grant a divorce and is not a finding that the conduct of one party is less heinous than that of the other. There is statutory power to award maintenance to a guilty wife as well as to an innocent one, and regard must be had to the conduct of both parties. Under present practice the registrar has to do the best he can from the decree and the shorthand note of the judgment, and there is no reason why the trial judge, who has the best means of knowing the conduct of the parties, should not, in his judgment, make any observations he thinks fit to guide the registrar on the point.

[As to the Granting of Maintenance to a Wife after a Decree, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 785-809, paras. 1244-1292 ; and for Cases, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 500-512, Nos. 5355-5512.]

Appeal by the husband from a decision of Mr. Commissioner Grazebrook, K.C., dated Nov. 10, 1948.

The court, in the exercise of its discretion having regard to the facts, now made a decree in favour of both husband and wife. The case is only reported on the question of maintenance after decree referred to in the judgment of Denning, L.J., and the short statement of the facts relevant to that issue is contained in the headnote.

R. F. Levy, K.C., and John Latey for the husband (petitioner).
Karminski, K.C., and Eric Myers for the wife (respondent).

BUCKNILL, L.J., delivered a judgment (with which ASQUITH, L.J., agreed) allowing the husband's appeal and granting decrees to both parties.

DENNING, L.J. : This appeal is nominally concerned with the question whether the husband or the wife should be granted a decree, but it is, in fact, really concerned with the question of maintenance. Everybody concerned realises that the marriage must be dissolved, but under the present practice of the Divorce Court maintenance is not awarded on the making of the decree as the statute provides it shall be. It is awarded at a later stage by the registrar, who is naturally influenced by the form in which the decree is pronounced. If the decree is pronounced in favour of the wife, she is in a strong position to get some maintenance from the husband even though she has herself committed adultery. If the decree is pronounced in favour of the husband, he is usually able to resist a maintenance order even though himself guilty of adultery, unless the wife can persuade the judge to award her a compassionate allowance. There is, however, no hiding the fact that the form of the decree is often no real guide to the conduct of the parties or to the merits of a claim for maintenance.

I have myself tried several cases where a husband left his wife and, unknown to her, committed adultery. She thereafter, in her loneliness, herself committed adultery. He then obtained a divorce against her for that adultery. She knew she was guilty and did not defend the case, but she did not know that he was equally, and even more, guilty than she was. The innocent-looking request in his petition that the court should use its " discretion " conveyed nothing to her. Hence she was deprived of maintenance which she ought to have had, or rather she would have been deprived of maintenance if I had not asked her to come to court and explained the position to her.

Such cases show how misleading the form of the decree may be. The current phrase whereby the court says that it exercises its discretion "in favour of" one side conveys the impression that the court is saying that that party's conduct is excusable, or, at any rate, not so heinous as that of the other, whereas the court is often saying no such thing. It is only saying what the statute authorises it to say, namely, that it is exercising its discretion to grant a divorce. It leaves any claim to maintenance entirely undecided. There is nothing in the statute to say that a wife against whom a decree has been made cannot be awarded maintenance, and there is nothing in it about discretion being exercised " in favour of " one side or the other or about a " compassionate allowance." All it says is that on a decree of divorce the court may award maintenance to the wife. This includes a guilty wife as well as an innocent one, but in awarding maintenance the court must have regard, of course, to the conduct of the parties. If the state of work in the Divorce Court does not enable the maintenance to be awarded by the judge who tries the case—and so has the best means of knowing the conduct of the parties—then the registrar must do the best he can, not merely from the form of the decree but also from the shorthand note of the judgment. I see no reason why the judge should not in his judgment make any observations he thinks fit to guide the registrar on this important point.

The form of decree pronounced by the commissioner in this case does not give a correct picture of the conduct of the parties. It seems to me to be eminently a case in which the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should pronounce a decree nisi on both petition and answer. That leaves the registrar free to assess maintenance without being embarrassed by the form of the decree. He should have regard to the conduct of the parties and to their respective resources. The wife's adultery in 1944 and her conduct later in refusing sexual intercourse, did a good deal to lead to the breakdown of this marriage, and full weight must be given by the registrar to those facts. It does not follow that she should get nothing. The husband's subsequent conduct in committing adultery put any reconciliation out of the question. The wife may get something or nothing. It is for the registrar to say.

Appeal allowed. The wife to receive costs up to £100.

[Court of Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Tucker and Singleton, L.JJ.), June 15, 1949.]

Limitation of Action—Debt—Acknowledgment—Balance sheets of debtor company handed to shareholder creditor—Parol evidence to explain entries—Debt due to creditor included in sum set out as total of company's debts—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), ss. 23 (4), 24 (1), (2).

By the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a) actions founded on simple contract shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued. By s. 23 (4) : " Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or . . . pecuniary claim . . . and the person liable or accountable therefor acknowledges the claim . . . the right shall be deemed to have accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment . . ." By s. 24 : " (1) Every such acknowledgment as aforesaid shall be in writing and signed by the person making the acknowledgment. (2) Any such acknowledgment . . . may be made by the agent of the person by whom it is required to be made . . . and shall be made to the person, or to an agent of the person, whose title or claim is being acknowledged . . . "

In 1936 and 1937 the plaintiff lent £1,807 to a company in which he was a shareholder. At the annual general meeting of the company on Dec. 31, 1946, at which the plaintiff was present as a shareholder, the accounts for the years 1939 to 1945 were presented to the meeting and included in the total sum shown as due to creditors, but not specifying it, the company's debt to the plaintiff. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the money lent, the company pleaded that the action was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a), but the plaintiff contended that the entry in the balance sheet presented to him at the meeting constituted an acknowledgment of his debt within the meaning of s. 24 (2) of the Act, notwithstanding that it was presented to him in his capacity as a shareholder and not as a creditor, and, therefore, by s. 23 (4), his right of action must be deemed to have accrued on the date of the acknowledgment.

Held : (i) parol evidence was admissible to show that part of the sum shown in the balance sheet as due to creditors was owed to the plaintiff.

(ii) the balance sheet presented to the plaintiff at the meeting of the company fulfilled all the requirements of s. 24, and, therefore, there was an acknowledgment by the company of the plaintiff's debt within the meaning of s. 24 (1) and (2), and, by s. 23 (4), the plaintiff's right of action must be deemed to have accrued on the date of acknowledgment, so that his claim was not barred under s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act.

APPEAL by the defendant company from a judgment of BIRKETT, J., dated Feb. 4, 1949.

In 1936 and 1937 the plaintiff lent £1,807 to the defendant company in which he was a shareholder. At the annual general meeting of the company in December, 1946, the plaintiff was handed by a director certain accounts of the company, signed by the accountants and two directors of the company. These accounts included the balance sheets for the years 1939 to 1945, in each of which was the entry : " Sundry creditors £7,638 8*s.* 10*d.*" In an action begun by the plaintiff in 1948 to recover the money lent, parol evidence was admitted to show that the sum mentioned in this entry included the debt due to the plaintiff. The company pleaded that the action was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a), it having been brought more than six years from 1936 and 1937 when the cause of action accrued, but the plaintiff contended that the entry in the balance sheets constituted a written acknowledgment of the debt within the meaning of s. 24 (1) and (2) of the Act, so that under s. 23 (4) his right of action must be deemed to have accrued in December, 1946. BIRKETT, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff and the Court of Appeal now upheld his decision.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : In my opinion, this appeal must fail. The case may appear to have some general importance with regard to the ability of companies to rely on the Limitation Act, 1939, but it really depends on its own facts and I wish to make it clear that our decision is based on those special facts. At various dates in 1936 and 1937 the plaintiff lent to the defendant company sums of money which amounted in all to £1,807. Those loans have not been repaid, and in 1948 the plaintiff brought this action to recover them. The defendant company relied for its defence on the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (a), and contended that, as the cause of action had arisen more than six years before action brought, the claim was barred. To that the plaintiff replied that the defendant company had acknowledged the claim during the six-years period, and, therefore, by s. 23 (4) of the Act, the right of action must be deemed to have accrued on, and not before, the date of the acknowledgment.

It appeared that at the annual general meeting of the defendant company on Dec. 31, 1946, at which the plaintiff was present in his capacity of shareholder, accounts for the years 1939 to 1945 inclusive were presented to the meeting. These accounts were signed by the company's accountants and two directors of the company. They showed that during each of the years 1939 to 1945 the company owed sums of money to creditors. No particular creditors were named, but the plaintiff contended, and it was not disputed, that the sums shown as due to creditors generally included the sum of £1,807 which was due to the plaintiff. He contended that the balance sheet presented to him at the meeting constituted an acknowledgment of his debt within the meaning of s. 24 (2) of the Act of 1939, notwithstanding that it was presented to him in his capacity as a shareholder and not as a creditor, and, therefore, his claim was not barred.

By s. 23 (4) of the Limitation Act, 1939 :

> " Where any right of action has accrued to recover any debt or . . . pecuniary claim . . . and the person liable or accountable therefor acknowledges the claim . . . the right shall be deemed to have accrued on and not before the date of the acknowledgment . . ."

Section 24 (1) requires that an acknowledgment must be in writing and signed by the person making the acknowledgment. By s. 24 (2) the acknowledgment may be made by the agent of the person by whom it is required to be made, and it must be made to the person whose claim is being acknowledged or to his agent. For the defendant company it is argued that the balance sheet is not such a document as can amount to an acknowledgment. I do not see why it cannot. Whether or not the document is an acknowledgment must A depend on what the document states, and a balance sheet presented to a creditor at a meeting of the company, as happened in this case, fulfils all the requirements of s. 24. The signed accounts show that the company admits that it owes a certain sum, and parol evidence was admitted, and rightly so, which showed that part of that sum was owed to the plaintiff. The statute does not extinguish a debt. It only bars the right of action.

B In Re Coliseum (Barrow), Ltd. (1), MAUGHAM, J., said ([1930] 2 Ch. 47):

> "It is now well settled . . . that the acknowledgment must be made to the creditor or to his agent: that is beyond dispute. In the present case the directors of the company, at various board meetings held from time to time, passed the balance sheets before them and two of them signed the balance sheets on behalf of the board pursuant to s. 113 of the C Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. Accordingly, had the statement been made in the balance sheet that the company owed a specified sum to a shareholder to whom the balance sheet was sent in the usual way that would have amounted, I think, to a sufficient acknowledgment within the authorities."

D In Re Atlantic and Pacific Fibre Importing and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. (2) CLAUSON, J., said ([1928] Ch. 839):

> "In my judgment the issue of the balance sheets constituted, in the circumstances, a sufficient acknowledgment of the company's indebtedness to the plaintiff and the other debenture holders under the debentures."

For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.), June 20, 21, 1949.]

G Will—Satisfaction—Satisfaction of debt by legacy—Annuity under deed—Bequest of sum for purchase of annuity of same amount—Direction in will to pay debts—Effect of words "give and bequeath."

The testator, having been divorced from his wife, by a deed dated Feb. 17, 1937, covenanted by way of provision for her and in consideration of her releasing any right she might have under an order of the court H or otherwise in respect of maintenance to pay to her during her life £250 per annum less income tax payable by equal monthly instalments from Nov. 1, 1936. It was provided that the obligations under the deed should continue notwithstanding that the testator might, as happened, predecease the wife. In July, 1944, the testator made a will by which he provided, inter alia: "I direct that all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses shall be paid as soon as conveniently may be after my decease." He further provided: "I give and bequeath £5,000 to purchase an annuity of £250 per annum less tax for [the wife] the balance of this £5,000 after the purchase of this annuity of £250 per annum less tax I give and bequeath to my grandchildren that is the children of my son Eric." There followed a number of legacies, each introduced by the words "I give and bequeath," and there was a residuary bequest to various persons and corporations. On the testator's death it was argued that the annuity bequeathed to the wife satisfied her annuity under the deed of 1937.

Held: although the fact that the annuity referred to in the gift to the wife was identical in amount with the annuity under the deed prima facie would give rise to the presumption that the latter was satisfied by the testamentary gift, the direction to pay the testator's debts (of which the obligation to pay the annuity under the deed was one) rebutted that presumption, and that view was supported by the fact that the gift to the wife was, not of an annuity equal in amount to the annuity under the deed, but of an interest in a sum set aside altogether from the residue, and also by the use of the words "give and bequeath" which were used throughout the will in relation to each gift.

Appeal by persons interested in the testator's residuary estate against an order of Wynn-Parry, J., dated Jan. 24, 1949.

Wynn-Parry, J., held that, on the true construction of the will, the bequest in the will of a sum for the purchase of an annuity of £250 per annum less tax, did not satisfy an obligation incurred by the testator under a deed to pay an annuity of the same amount to the legatee during her life. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts, which are summarised in the headnote, appear in the judgment of Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R.

Newsom for residuary legatees and the testator's grandchildren.

Raymond Jennings, K.C., and Lionel Edwards for the testator's wife.

McMullen for the Public Trustee, executor of the will.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This appeal raises a question of the application of what has been called the rule as to the satisfaction of debts by legacies. Counsel for the residuary legatees, indeed, has gone further and said that the rule, of which there have been many expressions of disapproval, ought now by this court to be given a new stimulus and clothed anew with vigour. The rule (and I quote it as I find it in Theobald on Wills, 10th ed., p. 541) is stated as follows:

> "The doctrine of satisfaction also applies to a legacy to a creditor. In such a case the legacy, if of equal or greater amount is prima facie considered a satisfaction of the debt."

Counsel for the residuary legatees says that the onus is on the creditor to show some ground why there should be inferred an intention on the part of the testator to give a bounty by will in addition to his obligation existing by contract. I A should add that the rule, which, as I say, has not been favoured by the courts, has, no doubt consequentially, become subject to exceptions which by reason of their artificiality themselves have not been the subject of much encomium. However, the main question in the present case is whether or not, on the facts, the rule (which has been established for a very long time) applies.

The testator married a woman from whom he was subsequently divorced. B After the divorce proceedings arrangements in one form or another were made for the provision by the testator of alimony for his former wife, and a final provision was made by deed of covenant dated Feb. 17, 1937. By that deed Mrs. Manners gave up any right she might have under a previous order of the court or otherwise in respect of maintenance, and in consideration of that release the testator convenanted that during her life he would pay her £250 C per annum less income tax. It was further provided that that provision should be given effect to as from October, 1936, and that the money should be payable by equal monthly instalments of £20 16*s*. 8*d*., beginning on Nov. 1, 1936. It was expressly provided that the obligations under the covenant should continue notwithstanding that the testator might, as, in fact, happened, predecease Mrs. Manners. The testator's will was made in July, 1944. After revoking D previous wills and appointing the Public Trustee as executor, he proceeded :

> "I direct that all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses shall be paid as soon as conveniently may be after my decease."

He then made the bequest which has given rise to the present question :

> "I give and bequeath £5,000 to purchase an annuity of £250 per annum E less tax for Amelia Martha Manners the balance of this £5,000 after the purchase of this annuity of £250 per annum less tax I give and bequeath to my grand-children that is the children of my son Eric James Manners."

I should interpolate here, first, that when the testator died (which was some few years after the will) having regard to the age of Mrs. Manners, the purchase price of the annuity was a figure of some £3,000 odd, so that there was, if the F annuity were bought, a substantial balance on which the remainder of the language which I have read would operate. Secondly, "the children of my son Eric James Manners" would be grand-children of the testator by the named son who was a child of his marriage to Mrs. Manners. It is unnecessary to read the rest of the will, but I observe that the form of it is that there follow a number of pecuniary legacies, each and every one of them introduced by the G same formula, "I give and bequeath . . ." Finally, the testator "gave and bequeathed" his residue in shares to various persons and corporations, and the appellants in this case represent two charities who were entitled to shares of residue.

The substance of the argument on behalf of the residuary legatees is that the annuity provided for by this will on the face of it was of the same amount H exactly, £250 per annum, less tax, as the subject of the contractual obligation, and, therefore, prima facie the rule would apply, and it is said that there is nothing in the will which takes it out of the rule. If their contention is correct and Mrs. Manners elects for the bequest to her in the will, the amount of the residue will be enhanced by the consequent satisfaction of the deed of 1937. Counsel for the residuary legatees has referred to Horlock v. Wiggins (1) which appears to be the last case when this subject-matter was discussed in this court. There by a deed of separation a husband had covenanted that on his decease his estate should pay to his wife, should she survive him, £100, with a proviso that if £6 per month was paid to her for six months from his death, the balance should only be paid at the end of that period. The relevant words of the will set out in the headnote were :

> " . . . after all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses are paid, I bequeath to my wife £100 payable within six months after my decease, £6 to be paid to her or her order until my estate is finally settled, the same to be deducted from the said £100 as per indenture stated in our mutual separation." A

It is to be noted that the deed and the will were substantially contemporaneous, and that was a matter strongly relied on by the Court of Appeal. But Bowen, L.J., in deciding against the application of the general rule in that case, also founded himself on the circumstance that the will there, as this will, B immediately before the relevant bequest directed payment of debts—and I observe that it is " debts " and not " debts and legacies." Bowen, L.J.'s language is (39 Ch.D. 147) :

> " The will directs payment of the bequest after payment of the testator's just debts, and the £100 in the separation deed was a debt existing when C the will was made."

In that passage Bowen, L.J., clearly indicated that that circumstance is one which is of great importance, to put it no higher, in considering whether the rule applies or not.

From a consideration of other cases and of the text books I think that it seems now to be tolerably clear that the presence of a direction for payment D either of debts and legacies or of debts simpliciter is treated as being, whether or not artificially—and I do not think it is particularly artificial—something which takes the case out of the rule. It is convenient to cite the passage which counsel for Mrs. Manners referred to in Hawkins on Wills, 3rd ed., p. 347. It is stated there in the form of a rule :

> " A direction by the testator that his debts and legacies should be paid, is E sufficient to rebut the presumption that a debt is satisfied by a legacy."

The learned author then deals with the distinction at one time thought to have existed between a direction to pay debts and legacies, and a direction to pay debts simpliciter. In the same connection I will refer to a decision the other way, that of Sir R. Malins, V.-C., in Atkinson v. Littlewood (2). That was a case in which the benefits given by the legacy were identical F in all respects with the subject of the obligation, which was, as here, an annual sum or annuity. In the course of his judgment the learned Vice-Chancellor referred to Chichester (Lord) v. Coventry (3) in the House of Lords as being an authority for the view that a direction for the payment of debts had the effect of taking out of the operation of the rule a case where there was a legacy to the creditor. He said (L.R. 18 Eq. 604) : G

> " This being, then, a settled rule, I am not at liberty to depart from it unless I can clearly satisfy myself that there is such an intention in the will as to warrant me in coming to a different conclusion. If this testator had directed his debts to be paid, and then had given this annuity, I should have found sufficient warrant, because that is the very point decided H in Chichester (Lord) v. Coventry (3)."

In my judgment, therefore, it must now be treated as settled that a direction of this kind does have the effect stated. By way of answer to that point, however, counsel for the residuary legatees has said that this obligation which existed under the deed of 1937 at the date of the testator's death was not in strictness a debt or was not a debt within the formula in the will. I am afraid I cannot agree with him. It is true that at the date of the testator's death, if there was not a monthly instalment then unpaid, there was nothing immediately owing for which Mrs. Manners could sue, but the effect of the covenant was that month by month, so long as Mrs. Manners lived, there came into existence obligations in debt which could have been enforced against the estate, as they could have been enforced against the testator. It seems to me impossible to say that a direction to pay debts was not intended to comprehend all kinds of contractual obligations to which the testator's estate was subject.

Counsel for the residuary legatees relied on a decision of ASTBURY, J., in Re Hall (4). I think he went so far as to say that, if we were to hold that the direction in this will to pay debts applied to the obligation under the deed of 1937, and, accordingly, operated to take this case out of the general rule, we must disapprove, if not overrule, the decision in Re Hall (4). It does not seem to me, however, that that is so. Re Hall (4) was a somewhat special case. By an ante-nuptial settlement a husband had settled on trust certain property whereof the wife enjoyed the income, but he had covenanted with the trustees that, if his wife survived him, his executors would yearly during her life pay to the trustees a sum sufficient to make up the income to £1,000 per annum less income tax. By the terms of the will the testator left his estate so that the income went to the wife and that income, added to the income of the settled property, produced a total figure considerably in excess of £1,000 a year. The real question was whether the directions the testator made by his will operated to fulfil and perform the obligations entered into by the ante-nuptial settlement to make up the income of the settled fund. The learned judge held that they did. I cite one passage from the judgment ([1918] 1 Ch. 566) :

> "The real question here is whether the direction to pay the income of the 'clear residuary estate' to his wife—it is quite true it is not through the medium of the trustees, but to her direct—ought to be regarded in the events that have happened, there being ample money for the purpose, as a performance in fact of the covenant entered into three years before his will. The doctrine of satisfaction, strictly so called, as distinct from performance applies to a legacy to a creditor, in which case the legacy, if of equal or greater amount, is prima facie considered to be a satisfaction of the debt. This general rule has often been disapproved, but it is a binding rule upon the court today."

I think by that passage the learned judge indicated that Re Hall (4) was not in strictness a case of the same kind as the case which is now before us. The particular significance of that case from the point of view of the residuary legatees is that in the course of it ASTBURY, J., dealt with the contention that, as the will contained a direction to pay debts, the presumption of satisfaction was rebutted so that the widow could claim both the benefit of the obligation under the settlement and the benefit under the will. The learned judge held that the direction could not fairly be said to cover the kind of obligation that might arise under the settlement, if, but only if, it turned out that there was anything to pay the wife to make up her income to £1,000 per annum. It seems to me clear that there is a world of difference between an obligation to pay £250 per annum by equal instalments and an obligation that, if an income does not reach a certain figure, that deficiency will be made good. In the latter case it is plain that at any given point of time it cannot be said whether or not there is in the future going to be any obligation on the estate. It is merely a contingent liability. Therefore, it seems to me that Re Hall (4) is wholly distinct from the present case, but the language used by the learned judge which I have read seems to me to support and confirm the view that I have ventured to express—that where one has an obligation to pay debts then that direction prima facie, at any rate, takes the case out of the general rule. In the same connection counsel for the residuary legatees also cited Re Hargreaves (5). That case again seems to me to be quite different from the present. The question there was whether a person who was entitled to an annuity could prove for the value of the annuity against the estate of the covenantor, not confining himself to the actual accrued liability, but claiming to value the whole annuity and future obligations thereunder, and then to prove for that sum as though it were a debt presently payable.

It seems to me, therefore, that on the authorities the presence of the direction to pay debts applies to take this case out of the general rule and that the direction to pay debts must be taken to cover the testator's obligation under the deed of 1937. It would, of course, have been open to counsel for the residuary legatees to show that other passages in the will indicated a contrary intention and that the testator meant, nevertheless, that the benefit under the will should be taken conditionally on its being treated as a satisfaction of the debt, but it seems to me that further examination of the will leads entirely in the opposite direction. I refer particularly to the fact that what is here given is not an annuity of an amount equal to the contractual annuity. It is not even a direction to the executors to provide a sum equivalent to such an annuity. It is a bequest of a sum of money out of which the annuity is to be purchased, and the balance of it is then given to other persons. That seems to me an indication against satisfaction, for the testator is not merely providing out of one and the same source, namely, the residue of his estate, a testamentary annuity in addition to the contractual annuity. He is, in effect, providing something like a settled legacy, setting aside for all purposes (and whether, indeed, there be satisfaction or whether there be not) a sum of £5,000 in which the residuary legatees will have no interest whatever. No case has been cited in which the doctrine of satisfaction has applied where the legacy is an interest in a sum set aside altogether and for all purposes from residue. I regard that as an element supporting the view that there is here no intention that the legacy should operate in satisfaction of the obligation. I add, finally, that the use of the words "give and bequeath," to which I have already alluded, which are adopted throughout the will in relation to each benefaction, seems to me to support the view that what the testator intended was in any case to give his wife a benefit under his will apart from and quite regardless of any contractual obligation he might be under by virtue of the covenant.

For these reasons it seems to me that the residuary legatees fail to make out a case for the application of the rule, and I can see no ground on the authorities which have been cited to me for giving a new stimulus to the rule which, as I have indicated, has many times been disapproved. Wynn-Parry, J., placed particular reliance on a matter to which I have not found it necessary to allude, namely, that there were differences in the times of payment and in the dates on which the annuitant could enforce her respective rights. On that point the learned judge followed the decision of Hall, V.-C., in Re Dowse (6). That point may provide another ground for supporting the view which I take, but for my part I prefer to rest my judgment on the grounds which I have stated, and to say nothing one way or the other on the question of times of payment and the soundness of the decision in Re Dowse (6). In my judgment, the conclusion of the learned judge was right, and this appeal must fail.

Criminal Law—Company—Trial—No written order giving leave to prefer bill of indictment—Validity of indictment—Duty of clerk of assize before signing bill of indictment—Criminal Justice Act, 1925 (c. 86), s. 33 (1)—Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933 (c. 36), s. 2 (2).

A company was charged before a magistrate with offences under the Betting Act, 1853. At the end of the hearing the magistrate purported to commit the company for trial. No written order was made at the time empowering the prosecutor to present a bill of indictment at the assizes against the company, as required by the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 33 (1), and, in fact, the order was not drawn up until the morning of the arraignment after the bill of indictment had been signed by the clerk of assize. When the company was called on to plead, its counsel contended that the indictment was bad because s. 33 (1) had not been complied with, but the judge overruled the objection and held that a written order was not necessary and that the magistrate's statement that he committed the company for trial was a sufficient compliance with the Act.

Held : (i) where a statute made an order of a particular character a necessary condition precedent to the doing of some act, that order must be drawn up in writing, and an order under s. 33 (1) must be in writing under the hand of the magistrate and authenticated with the seal of the court, though it was not necessary that it should be drawn up on the same day as the committal and it would be valid even if it were drawn up some considerable time afterwards.

(ii) an order under s. 33 (1) must be made before the bill of indictment was signed by the clerk of assize ; that was not done in the present case ; and, therefore, the indictment was bad.

Per curiam : where it is proposed to indict a company the clerk of assize must be satisfied, before signing the bill of indictment, that the order giving leave to prefer it has been made.

Appeal against conviction.

The appellant company was tried and convicted before Sellers, J., at the Glamorgan Assizes of offences against the Betting Act, 1853, and now complained that the indictment was bad. The appeal was allowed and the conviction quashed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by Lord Goddard, C.J.

Beyfus, K.C., and Roderic Bowen for the appellants.

Arthian Davies, K.C., and Meurig Evans for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The appellant company was indicted at Glamorgan Assizes in respect of certain offences against the Betting Act, 1853. The company being called upon to plead, counsel for the company took the point that the indictment against the company was bad because certain statutory provisions had not been complied with. It was said that there was no order in force by the examining magistrate giving leave to the prosecutor to prefer the bill of indictment, and that, as there was no order, no bill of indictment could be preferred. Sellers, J., overruled that contention, held that a written order was not necessary, and further held that, as the magistrate had said when the case was before him that he committed the defendants for trial, there was sufficient compliance with the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925.

The company, with two directors of the company, had been charged before the magistrate with the offence. The magistrate did not deal with the offence himself, but at the end of the hearing, on Jan. 25, 1949, he committed all the defendants for trial. On the afternoon before the trial at the assizes the solicitor for the defence asked the magistrate's clerk whether any order had been made by the magistrate under the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 33 (1), empowering the prosecutor to prefer a bill at the assizes, and he was told that no order had been made. By the next morning, however, before the arraignment, an order had been made by the magistrate in writing which would comply with the provisions of the statute and dated nunc pro tunc, that is to say, dated back to Jan. 25, 1949. I do not think there is any reflection on him for having done that, nor do I think the fact that he did not draw up the order on the day he heard the case would make any difference. If the order had to be made he could make it at a date subsequent to the date on which he actually announced his decision provided it was otherwise made in time.

We have no information when the indictment was actually signed by the clerk of assize. Before dealing with that point I will state what I understand the law to be. At common law it was possible for anybody to prefer a bill of indictment to a grand jury against either an individual or a corporation, and if the grand jury returned a true bill that converted the bill into an indictment to which the defendant had to plead. That was the common law, subject to the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, which restricted the right of a person to prefer a bill to a grand jury in respect of certain offences. It remained the law until the passing of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, which abolished grand juries. During the war of 1914/18, for the purpose of saving manpower the Grand Juries (Suspension) Act, 1917, was passed and while that Act remained in force the position was in substance the same as it became after the passing of the Act of 1933. After 1933 (and also during the time when the Grand Juries (Suspension) Act, 1917, was in force) it was no longer open to any subject of the King to prefer a bill of indictment of his own motion to a grand jury. An indictment could only be preferred if one or other of certain preliminary steps had been taken. There must either have been a committal for trial by examining justices sitting under the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, or leave must have been granted by a judge of the High Court, or there must have been a committal for trial under the Perjury Act, 1911, by the court before whom the perjury was committed. The voluntary bill, as it used to be called, no longer existed. It is still open to a person who desires to prefer a voluntary bill—as, for instance, in a case where magistrates have refused to commit for trial—to apply to a judge for leave to prefer a bill, but it will no longer be a voluntary bill because it will be preferred by permission of a judge. The old position under which any person on the first day of assizes could take a bill of indictment and hand it to the clerk of assize and require that it should be put before the grand jury has gone.

While the Grand Juries (Suspension) Act, 1917, was in force, a company called Daily Mirror Newspapers, Ltd., was indicted at Hertford Quarter Sessions for an offence, and objection was taken that the indictment was bad because there could have been no committal for trial of the company.

"Committed for trial" is defined in the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 27, as follows :

> "In every Act passed after the commencement of this Act, the expression 'committed for trial' used in relation to any person shall, unless the contrary intention appears, mean, as respects England and Wales, committed to prison with the view of being tried before a judge and jury, A whether the person is committed in pursuance of s. 22 or of s. 25 of the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, or is committed by a court, judge, coroner, or other authority having power to commit a person to any prison with a view to his trial, and shall include a person who is admitted to bail upon a recognizance to appear and take his trial before a judge and jury."

A company cannot be committed to prison and cannot be held to bail, and, B therefore, it was decided in R. v. Daily Mirror Newspapers, Ltd. (1), that so long as the Grand Juries (Suspension) Act, 1917, was in force, a bill could not be preferred to a court except in three circumstances—either a committal for trial, or an order of a judge, or an order made under the Perjury Act, 1911. As there had been no order by the judge it followed that, unless there had been a committal for trial, the indictment was bad because there was no power C to prefer it, and the court held that the indictment was bad. Possibly in consequence of that decision, the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 33 (1), provided :

> "Where a corporation is charged, whether alone or jointly with some other person, with an indictable offence, the examining justices may, if they are of opinion that the evidence offered on the part of the prosecution is sufficient to put the accused corporation upon trial, make an order D empowering the prosecutor to present to the grand jury at assizes or quarter sessions, as the case may be, a bill in respect of the offence named in the order, and for the purpose of any enactments referring to committal for trial (including this Act) any such order shall be deemed to be a committal for trial . . ."

E It seems to me that that Act did not take away the old common law right of preferring a bill against a corporation. It was dealing with a case where a corporation had been charged before magistrates and the magistrates had determined to send the case for trial.

Then came the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, which abolished grand juries. Section 1 provides :

> F "Subject to the provisions of this section grand juries are hereby abolished, but where a bill of indictment has been signed in accordance with the provisions of this Act, the indictment shall be proceeded with in the same manner as it would have been proceeded with before the commencement of this Act if it had been found by a grand jury . . ."

G By s. 2 (1) :

> "Subject to the provisions of this section, a bill of indictment charging any person with an indictable offence may be preferred by any person before a court in which the person charged may lawfully be indicted for that offence, and where a bill of indictment has been so preferred the proper officer of the court shall, if he is satisfied that the requirements of H the next following subsection have been complied with, sign the bill, and it shall thereupon become an indictment and be proceeded with accordingly : Provided that if the judge or chairman of the court is satisfied that the said requirements have been complied with, he may, on the application of the prosecutor or of his own motion, direct the proper officer to sign the bill and the bill shall be signed accordingly."

The important sub-s. (2) is :

> "Subject as hereinafter provided no bill of indictment charging any > person with an indictable offence shall be preferred unless either (a) the person charged has been committed for trial for the offence ; or (b) the bill is preferred by the direction or with the consent of a judge of the High Court or pursuant to an order made under s. 9 of the Perjury Act, 1911."

So there again the same position arises that the old common law right is taken away and a bill can be preferred only if there has been a committal for trial A or an order of a judge.

In the present case, the first point that was argued by counsel for the Crown in support of the indictment was that the magistrate in committing for trial had in effect given leave to the prosecutor to prefer a bill under the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 33 (1). He supported that by saying that the statute did not require the order to be in writing, and SELLERS, J., so B held. With all respect to the learned judge, this court is unable to take that view. Where a statute makes an order of a particular character a necessary condition precedent to the doing of some other act, we think that we must construe that statute as meaning that the order must be in writing drawn up under the hand of the presiding magistrate and with the seal of the court. The order must be authenticated, and if any question arises whether or not C an order has been made, the right way of proving that order is by producing it. That can be done only if it is in writing. This court does not feel any doubt that they ought to construe s. 33 (1) as meaning that the court must make the order in the way that an order of the court is usually—in fact, I think, invariably—made, that is to say, it must be drawn up and be in writing and authenticated. There was no order drawn up and authenticated at the time. D
What the magistrate did was to commit for trial, and, on the analogy of the Daily Mirror Newspapers case (1), he had no power to do that, because a corporation cannot be committed for trial. He ought to have made an order, and I say at once that if, having made up his mind that there was a case to go for trial, he had drawn up the order afterwards, no good objection could have been made based on the mere fact that he did not draw up the order on the E actual day. If a court gives its decision verbally, as it almost invariably does, the order is drawn up afterwards. It may be drawn up the same day ; it may be drawn up one day, or two or three days, or even a considerable time, after. In the High Court orders (for instance, in the Chancery Division, which have to be passed by the registrar and so forth) are not drawn up until a considerable time after the learned judge has given his judgment. In the King's Bench F
Division orders are very often not drawn up till some days after the trial.

As we now know, this order giving leave to prefer a bill was not drawn up until the morning of the arraignment, and I think we must assume that the bill of indictment by that time had been signed, because I am certain that, if the bill of indictment had not been signed and the clerk of assize had been waiting for this order to come through, he would have told the learned judge G that the order had come through that morning and he had signed the bill after he had got it. In any case we think we cannot refuse to apply the maxim omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta and to presume that the clerk of assize had done his duty and had signed the bill before he came into court and before this document was received, taking, perhaps, the same view that SELLERS, J., did, that, as the magistrate had indicated that it was a case to go for trial, H that was a sufficient compliance with the Act of 1925.

It follows from what I have said that the signing of the bill was the critical moment by reason of the provisions of the Act to which I have just referred. The bill becomes an indictment as soon as it is signed. I do not think it is necessary to deal with the rules, because those deal with the supplying of copies of the bill to the proper officers of the court and provide that "except with the leave of the judge or chairman no bill of indictment shall be preferred at any assizes after the first working day of those assizes or sessions." That is only the preferring, not the signing, and that rule has been held to apply only to cases where there has not been a proceeding before the justices.

We put our decision on this ground. We must hold that in the particular circumstances it is right to assume that this order was not made by the magistrate before the bill was signed. That being so, when the bill was signed, and, therefore, the indictment became effective, there had not been a compliance with the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, s. 33 (1). There had been a committal for trial, but it was nugatory, and the position was the same as if the magistrate had refused to commit for trial.

For the reasons which I have expressed the court is of opinion that effect must be given to the preliminary point taken by counsel for the company, and we hold that this bill of indictment is bad against the company. It follows from what I have said—and I wish to emphasise it—that it is the duty of a clerk of assize in any case in which it is proposed to indict a company to be satisfied before he signs the bill that the necessary order has been made.

Conviction quashed.

In 1930 C., Ltd. was incorporated, and it carried on business as spinners of fine yarn and worsted at Cleckheaton. In 1937 C., Ltd., in which S. owned 9,900 out of the 10,000 shares issued, acquired the lease of some mills at Bradford and there carried on a separate business of spinning yarn of coarser quality. In February, 1941, the Bradford mill was closed, C., Ltd. intending to transfer the Bradford business to other premises (not then obtained) at Cleckheaton, where it was proposed to continue the spinning of coarser yarn by means of a new company to be incorporated. Before new premises were obtained, however, C., Ltd. received an offer to purchase about half the machinery in the Bradford mill, and sold it. The remaining machinery was stored in Cleckheaton. In those circumstances, on June 28, 1941, the new company, R., was incorporated, but it was decided that it should for the time being carry on the business of warehousemen. S. was allotted 51 of the 52 shares issued in the R. Co., which leased premises in Cleckheaton from an independent company, and, as from April, 1941, carried on business as warehousemen there. The R. Co. stored the surplus machinery from the Bradford mill on its premises and also stored some wool for C., Ltd., for which services C., Ltd. paid storage charges to the R. Co., and wool for the Wool Control, the charges for which comprised the major part of the R. Co.'s income. There was no evidence that the R. Co. was incorporated by or on behalf of C., Ltd., or that C., Ltd. provided any capital for the R. Co. There was no suggestion that C., Ltd. was transferring trade or business to the R. Co. In a direction under s. 35 (1) the Commissioners of Inland Revenue specified two transactions for the purposes of s. 33 (3) : (i) the formation of the R. Co. and (ii) the allotment to S. of 51 shares in the R. Co. out of the total issued capital of 52 shares. The direction directed (a) that C., Ltd. should be treated as carrying on the business of the R. Co. in addition to its own business, and (b) that the consequent liability to tax should be a joint and several liability of C., Ltd. and the R. Co. The Special Commissioners found that avoidance or diminution of the liability of C., Ltd., to excess profits tax was the main benefit to be expected from the transactions during the currency of excess profits tax, and upheld the direction (a) above. With regard to (b) they held that there was no power to direct joint and several liability. On appeal by the taxpayers, HELD : as regards s. 33 (3) (a) the allotment of shares in the R. Co. to S. could not be a transfer or an acquisition of shares by C., Ltd., which had no part in the transaction, for there was no suggestion that the incorporation of the R. Co. or the allotment of shares to S. were illusory or colourable, or that S. held the shares on behalf of C., Ltd., and s. 33 (3) (b) had no application because there was no evidence that C., Ltd. carried on business as warehousemen and there had been a change in the trade or business carried on by them. It was irrelevant that S. was the main corporator in both companies, and the appeal should be allowed.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax on the question whether a direction given by the Inland Revenue Commissioners under the Finance Act, 1941, s. 35 (1), and the Finance Act, 1944, s. 33 (3), could be supported.

The Special Commissioners took the view that a company in which the main shareholder was one J. Smith must be regarded as carrying on the business of a new company in which J. Smith was also the main shareholder, and that the main benefit to be expected from the setting up of the new company and the allotment of shares therein to J. Smith was the avoidance or diminution of the liability to excess profits tax of the first-mentioned company. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., allowed the taxpayers' appeal and it became unnecessary to argue the cross appeal. The facts, which appear in the judgment, are summarised in the headnote.

Graham-Dixon for the company, C., Ltd.
Cyril King, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: The point involved is whether a certain direction given by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Finance Act, 1941, s. 35, as amended by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 33, can be supported. It must be pointed out, as was pointed out by WROTTESLEY, J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 21), in Marshall Castings, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) that these powers of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are far reaching. They are a delegation " of a discretion ordinarily reserved by Parliament to itself; for they enable the commissioners by adjustment to charge with tax persons who otherwise would not be chargeable," or would be chargeable in a less amount. Therefore, as it seems to me, the court should scrutinise the exercise of those powers with some particularity. The Finance Act, 1941, s. 35 (1), as amended, provides:

> " Where the commissioners are of opinion that the main purpose or one of the main purposes for which any transaction or transactions was or were effected . . . was the avoidance or reduction of liability to excess profits tax, they may, if they think fit, direct that such adjustments shall be made as respects liability to excess profits tax as they consider appropriate so as to counteract the avoidance or reduction of liability to excess profits tax which would otherwise be effected by the transaction or transactions."

I need not trouble with the conditions laid down in that sub-section because the Special Commissioners, having heard evidence, came to the conclusion (which I think is a conclusion of fact) that the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the transaction or transactions in this case was not the avoidance or reduction of liability to excess profits tax. There was, indeed, evidence on which they could so hold, and that point, accordingly, has not been argued before me. By s. 33 (3) of the Act of 1944, however, another consequence of a transaction or transactions is envisaged. That sub-section provides:

> " If it appears in the case of any transaction or transactions being a transaction which involves, or transactions one or more of which involve: (a) the transfer or acquisition of shares in a company; or (b) a change or changes in the person or persons carrying on a trade or business or part of a trade or business, that, having regard to the provisions of the law relating to excess profits tax, other than the said s. 35 and this section, which were in force at the time when the transaction or transactions was or were effected, the main benefit which might have been expected to accrue from the transaction or transactions during the currency of excess profits tax was avoidance or reduction of liability to the tax, the avoidance or reduction of liability to excess profits tax shall be deemed for the purposes of the said s. 35 to have been the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the transaction or transactions."

I have to be satisfied, not that one of the main benefits which might have been expected to accrue was involved, but that the main benefit which might have been expected to accrue was the avoidance or reduction of tax. When that stage is reached the sub-section says that for the purposes of s. 35 such avoidance or reduction to be deemed to have been the main purpose or one of the main purposes of the transaction or transactions. To which I will add from Marshall Castings, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), some further observations from the judgment of Wrottesley, J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 22) :

> " The tax avoidance which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have to counteract by adjustment is clearly tax avoidance by the company. For in the case of a company, the tax if not avoided would be assessed on and raised from the company. On this side of the scales, therefore, is to be placed the benefit which might be expected by a reasonable man to accrue to the company in the form of tax avoidance flowing from the transaction. Then in order to see whether this benefit was the main benefit to the company, it seems to me that the commissioners must next look at the other benefits which might be expected, by a reasonable man, to accrue to the company during the currency of the tax from the transaction . . ."

and then the learned judge goes on to give some instances. I am in some doubt about what is the jurisdiction of this court on a Case Stated like the present. The test of the reasonable man suggests to me that this is a question of fact. We all know that the hypothetical " reasonable man " exists chiefly in the minds of lawyers attempting to find answers to conundra in the courts. If so, it must be based on evidence. One must not, however, lose sight of the fact that the whole thing is based on s. 35—" the opinion of the commissioners." I prefer to regard this altogether as a legal problem based on facts which are found. I hope that by so doing I shall not be attempting to substitute my own opinion on fact for the opinion which has been formed by the commissioners.

With those introductory observations it is, perhaps, as well that I should remember the observations of Lord Greene, M.R., in British Pacific Trust, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2) where, in dealing, not with the second branch, but with the first branch, of this legislation, the Master of the Rolls considers what the word " transaction " means, and says (E.P.T. Leaflet, No. 55, p. 3) :

> " The word ' transaction,' it appears to me, means what it says. A sale is a transaction. A purchase is a transaction, and it is in a sense the same transaction, but it depends on the side from which you are looking at it."

It seems to me that I have to look at this matter from the point of view of the company, and, if anybody else is a party to the transaction, what they thought, or did, or intended, is not in point. I look, first of all, to see whether s. 33 (3) has been satisfied here. The direction was made on Feb. 21, 1945. What it purports to describe as the transactions involved are :—(i) The formation of Rawfolds Spinning Co., Ltd., on June 28, 1941. It seems to me that in cases of this sort the subject is entitled to know completely what the transactions are which are going to be relied on following on the direction by the tax officials when they come to make the necessary calculations to lead to an assessment of excess profits tax. The formation of a limited liability company is not one of the things set out in s. 33 (3). I think, however, that I must take that transaction with the one that follows, which is (ii) " The allotment of 51 shares in Rawfolds Spinning Co., Ltd., out of the total issued capital of 52 shares to Mr. J. Smith who holds 9,900 out of 10,000 shares in Joseph Smith (Cleckheaton), Ltd.", the subject on whom this present direction is now attempted to be supported. I may say that the direction was addressed to the directors of each company, naming it. It is now admitted by the Crown, having regard to authority, that the direction to the Rawfolds Spinning Co., Ltd., cannot be supported, and, indeed, the commissioners have declined to follow it.

I look to see whether these two transactions as set out in the direction bring the case within s. 33 (3). The words "the transfer or acquisition of shares
A in a company" must refer to transfer or acquisition by the company involved in the direction which is now only Joseph Smith (Cleckheaton), Ltd. The second case in the sub-section is: "a change or changes in the person or persons carrying on a trade or business or part of a trade or business." I cannot see that the allotting of shares in Rawfolds to Mr. J. Smith can be either a transfer or an acquisition of shares by Joseph Smith (Cleckheaton), Ltd.,
B unless there were a finding that the beneficial interest in those shares belonged to that company—in other words, that Mr. Joseph Smith held them on behalf of the company. The circumstance that he is an overwhelming corporator in Joseph Smith (Cleckheaton), Ltd., will not do by itself. Who allotted the shares? I can only assume that the shares were allotted by the directors of the Rawfolds Spinning Co., Ltd. The whole thing may be only a device by
C the directors of Joseph Smith (Cleckheaton), Ltd., and, if the Case had so found, there might not have been any difficulty, but in a carefully framed Case there is not a suggestion that any one of these transactions was illusory or colourable or otherwise than what it purported to be. Indeed, the commissioners, in stating the Case, have affirmatively said that there was no intention of any excess profits tax evasion, and they have set out other reasons which
D they have accepted as being the truth. There is no evidence that the Cleckheaton company carried on business even in part as warehousemen and, therefore, there could be no change in the person or persons carrying on their trade or business. It looks to me, therefore, as if this case is not within sub-s. (3) at all. Nothing more is said in the direction than the two things which I have indicated. There is not a word about any transaction between the two
E companies. So far as the direction is concerned, there is no statement that the Rawfolds Spinning Co., Ltd., ever started business or did anything, and it is only by looking at the Case Stated to see what the Crown attempted to prove in trying to get this case on its legs under sub-s. (3) that the Special Commissioners have given me enlightenment by stating a number of other facts which were proved before them.

F There is a history attaching to all this matter, and some of the facts are, I think, of considerable importance. The Cleckheaton company was registered as long ago as 1930. It carried on business at Cleckheaton as spinners of fine yarn and worsted. The memorandum of association does not expressly mention that they are authorised to carry on business as warehousemen. I express no concluded opinion about it, but I have doubts whether cl. C of the memorandum
G is wide enough in its terms to authorise them to do so. In fact, they did not. The Cleckheaton company carried on business at premises which they held on lease, and the Case finds that the whole of the premises were in use—I take that to mean in the spinning business—and no expansion of business was possible. In 1937 the Cleckheaton company acquired the lease of some mills at Bradford and there they carried on a separate business of spinning yarn of a coarser
H quality than that worked at Cleckheaton. For business reasons, which are not relevant to this particular inquiry, the branch at Bradford was closed in February, 1941, and a decision was reached to concentrate all the business at Cleckheaton. The mill at Bradford was, apparently, properly equipped with machinery. Before new premises for the Bradford business had been obtained at Cleckheaton, the Cleckheaton company received an offer for about half of the machinery in the Bradford mill, and sold it. Having necessity to store somewhere the remainder of the machinery, they did it by taking on short term certain premises at Cleckheaton which are not, so far as I have been able to discover, of any relevance in the present matter. They meant to form a new company to operate the rest of their machinery from Bradford at fresh premises, and it was decided—the Case does not state by whom, but as Mr. Joseph Smith was the moving spirit and almost the only shareholder in the Cleckheaton company I assume that the decision was his—that the Rawfolds Co. should ultimately carry on the business of spinning, but that in the meantime—and, after all, this was during the war when the equipping of new factories would not be easy—it should carry on the business of warehousemen. In those circumstances Rawfolds was incorporated on June 28, 1941. There is no evidence that Rawfolds was incorporated by the Cleckheaton company or on behalf of that company. There is no evidence that the capital required to enable Rawfolds to commence business within the meaning of the Companies Act, 1929, was provided by the Cleckheaton company. The only thing that I do know is—and to my astonishment it has been very much emphasised at the Bar—that the language used in the " objects " clause of the memorandum was in exactly similar terms in the case of each company. I express my astonishment for two reasons. Those who are acquainted with the way in which these documents are prepared would not attach much importance to the circumstance that the same book of precedents was used for both companies or that one was copied from the other. What is more astonishing to me is that, there being the intention to carry on a warehousing business through Rawfolds, no express power is taken in Rawfolds' memorandum of association to do so.

The next thing that happened was that Rawfolds obtained a lease of certain old dye works known as Rawfolds Dye Works at Cleckheaton, not from the Cleckheaton company, but from a wholly independent limited liability company, John Rigby & Son, Ltd. Having obtained those premises in that way at a yearly rent of £200 a year as from Apr. 1, 1941, Rawfolds proceeded to carry on business in those premises as warehousemen. Paragraph 6 of the Case describes how they got their business :

> " In these premises a part of the unsold portion of the Cleckheaton company's machinery was stored until it was finally disposed of by August, 1942 [two and a half years before the direction] and some wool was also warehoused for the Cleckheaton company, for both of which services that company paid storage to Rawfolds, and, in addition, wool was stored for the Wool Control, a ' ration ' of such storage having been sought and obtained . . . The rent or storage charges received from the Wool Control formed, however, the main part of Rawfolds' income."

In addition, at some unspecified time, to some unspecified extent, and with what result I do not know, the Cleckheaton company bought some uncontrolled material, sold it to Rawfolds, and Rawfolds re-sold it unprocessed.

There was no transaction which I have been able to find in the Case—certainly no transaction is indicated in the direction—which suggests that the Cleckheaton company had transferred any branch of their business or any part of their trade or business. There is no suggestion that the Cleckheaton company (which is occupying the whole of their spinning mill, and is, apparently, unable to find any more room for business in it) were transferring to Rawfolds either a trade or a business or a part of a trade or a business which theretofore they had carried on. There is nothing to indicate that the acquisition of shares in Rawfolds was other than an acquisition by Mr. Smith in his own right. Further, it is plain that for the direction of the commissioners to be right the benefit which is to be expected from these transactions is a benefit, not to Mr. Smith, but to the Cleckheaton company.

The commissioners were under the impression that the result of this was that the business of Rawfolds should be regarded as being carried on by the Cleckheaton company in addition to the latter's own business. That seems to me a hopeless view. It was said that the liability so computed should be a joint and several liability of the two companies, but that has been negatived and has disappeared from the case. Paragraph 8 of the Case states evidence of Mr. Smith which was accepted, and, therefore, constitutes facts which were found by the Special Commissioners. He said that Rawfolds

> " . . . was intended eventually to carry on the spinning business previously carried on by the Cleckheaton company [at Bradford] and that as the two types of business were different it was desirable to have separate companies. There were many spinning firms in Bradford using similar bobbins, and to keep the bobbins separate it was necessary to have a different name thereon, and the easiest way of doing this was to have a separate company. He also had personal reasons for forming a new company as he had two nephews who would, he hoped, eventually succeed to his business; and he desired for family reasons that the portions to which they should succeed should be separate."

It is said that the answer to this lies in the contention that Mr. Smith was not an old man and could be expected to continue in control of the two businesses for a considerable time, but how that prevents the object of the formation of the company being the one indicated by his accepted evidence, I do not follow.

The commissioners found that it had not been established to their satisfaction "that reduction or avoidance of excess profits tax was in fact one of the main purposes with which Rawfolds was formed." They added:

> "We found, however, that avoidance or diminution of liability to excess profits tax was the main benefit to be expected from the transaction during the currency of excess profits tax."

That follows the language of s. 33 (3), but there is no examination of the conditions which bring that sub-section into play. The finding goes on:

> "There was an obvious benefit in the way of possible reduction of excess profits tax because, if the profits made at the new premises were so made by the Cleckeaton company, they might be absorbed in excess profits tax, whereas the new Rawfolds Co. would obtain an additional standard."

That may be the result, but it is largely fancy. If I am to apply the test of the reasonable man, I do not understand how any reasonable man could come to the conclusion that the obvious benefit of some other business being carried on by a separate limited company, although in the same town, is a benefit in the way of a possible reduction of excess profits tax.

The fact of the matter is that there has been a confusion of thought between the two companies and the gentleman who happens to be the main corporator in each of them, and who, I presume, has provided the capital represented by the number of shares that he holds. I find it impossible to say that the result which has been arrived at is justified on the evidence. There was no transaction that I can discover to which Joseph Smith (Cleckheaton), Ltd., was a party. If the word "transaction", contrary to the views expressed by LORD GREENE, M.R., in British Pacific Trust, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), means merely some trade dealing (which is a possible view of it), there was no trade dealing, unilateral or bilateral, by the Cleckheaton company. The right order to make is that the appeal be allowed, with the result that the direction must be set aside. The Crown must pay the costs.

Appeal allowed with costs. The Crown also to pay the costs of the cross appeal.

[Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (Lord Merriman, P., and Barnard, J.), June 14, 15, 16, 1949.]

Desertion—Summary jurisdiction—Complaint—Withdrawal of previous summons based on same facts—Right to make subsequent complaint within statutory time limit—Estoppel—Res judicata.

In April, 1946, a wife left her husband on the ground, as she alleged, of his conduct towards her. On June 3, 1948, a summons by the wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4, for maintenance on the ground of the husband's desertion came before a court of summary jurisdiction, but was withdrawn by the wife after she had given her evidence. On Mar. 29, 1949, a second summons by the wife charging the husband with desertion was heard by justices, who found the charge proved and made an order against the husband. The evidence given at the hearing of the two summonses was substantially the same. On an appeal by the husband to the Divisional Court from the order of the justices, he contended that the withdrawal of the first summons precluded the wife from bringing a second summons on the same grounds.

Held : the matter of the complaint not having been adjudicated on in June, 1948, the wife was not estopped in March, 1949, from proceeding with a second complaint based on the same matter, provided it was made within the limit of six months prescribed by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 11 ; the matter of complaint being a continuous desertion, her second complaint was made within the statutory time limit ; and, therefore, the justices had jurisdiction to hear her second summons.

Hopkins v. Hopkins ([1914] P. 282), not followed.

Per Lord Merriman, P. : To hold that for some reason peculiar to matrimonial cases a withdrawal, not leading to an adverse adjudication, but a mere withdrawal, whether on a preliminary point or during the hearing of the case, operates in any sense as an estoppel per rem judicatam would be to place the matrimonial jurisdiction in a state of unwarranted isolation in the general system of law. In my opinion, there is no warranty for that, and I do not think that we ought to feel ourselves bound by the decision in Hopkins v. Hopkins ([1914] P. 282), based, as I think it is, on a misapprehension of what was really said by the court in Pickavance v. Pickavance ([1901] P. 60), to come to any such conclusion.

APPEAL by the husband from a decision of the Manchester city justices, dated Mar. 29, 1949, whereby they found the husband guilty of desertion and awarded the wife 30*s*. a week maintenance.

The husband contended (inter alia) that the justices had no jurisdiction to deal with the wife's application because a previous summons charging him with desertion on the same facts had been heard by the same court on June 3, 1948, and had been withdrawn by the wife after she had given her evidence. The Divisional Court now held that the justices had jurisdiction to deal with the second summons as there had been no adjudication on the matter of complaint, but, having regard to the fact that on the hearing of the second summons the wife had not disclosed the earlier proceedings and, in particular, certain evidence given by her on that occasion, they allowed the husband's appeal, set aside the order, and remitted the wife's summons for re-hearing. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

Henry Gore and H. V. Brandon for the husband.
Simon for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is a husband's appeal against a decision of the Manchester city justices, who, on Mar. 29, 1949, made an order against him on the ground of desertion and awarded the wife 30*s*. a week maintenance. The case is by no means an easy one, either on the facts or on the law. I will deal first with the facts because it is submitted that on any view of the matter it will be necessary to have a re-hearing.

When the wife appeared before the justices on Mar. 29, she was represented by a solicitor and the husband did not appear. No satisfactory reason for his non-attendance has been given and it is assumed that he did not appear owing to his own neglect or default. The wife gave her evidence and in substance stated that, having been married in August, 1944, and a child of the marriage having been born in January, 1945, she had left her husband in April, 1946, on account of his association with other women. She spoke of having found compromising letters and of his staying out all night, and also of his having refused to speak to her for ten months before the parting. She added that she had been asked to leave the matrimonial home (which was at the house of the husband's mother) for a short period to enable the mother to have a holiday ; that at the conclusion of that period she asked the husband to join her, but he refused, whereupon she went back to live at his mother's house where he made it clear, particularly by refusing to speak to her, that he wished to have nothing more to do with her ; and that things drifted on thus for the next ten months or thereabouts until she decided to leave him for the reasons stated. That evidence being uncontradicted, it is not surprising that the justices were satisfied that the husband's association with other women, coupled with his behaviour towards the wife, fully justified her in leaving him, and that he by his conduct was guilty of desertion.

Unfortunately, that is not the whole story. If it were, it would not have been necessary to spend very much time on this case, but the fact is that the wife had brought an earlier charge of desertion before the same court, and that charge was heard on June 3, 1948. Some of the evidence, particularly as regards dates, was the same. According to the notes with which we have been provided, she did not, on that occasion, mention anything about the husband's association with other women, but she did mention that he had refused to speak to her for ten months before she left, that she had gone away, and that he had refused to join her when his mother had gone on holiday in the year before the parting.

She also mentioned something else, which is manifestly of considerable importance. The husband had been serving in the Royal Air Force until July or August, 1947, and she said that she, having continued to draw the Royal Air Force allowance, met the husband in Manchester in August, 1947, when he asked her to return to him, and she consented to do so if he would find a home of their own. She added that a few weeks later he wrote to say that he could not even find rooms, much less a house, but that they had met several times since and had been quite friendly. She was cross-examined, and repeated on oath her story that he had never spoken to her for ten months before the parting, though she agreed that they were quite happy until June, 1945, when this sulking is said to have begun. She agreed that it was she who had left the husband, and she added that she did not want any money for herself but only for the child. Thereupon the summons for desertion was withdrawn by her. Precisely why that happened it is probably impossible, after this lapse of time, to determine. It may be that she realised that the case was not going well for her and that she had better not proceed with it, or it may be that, having said that she did not want money for herself, as she was earning money by her own work, she may have been advised, or, at any rate, had it suggested to her by the clerk or the justices, that, if all she was claiming was custody of and maintenance for the child, she would be better advised to proceed under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925. I think it is very likely that something of that sort happened, because within a very short time after the withdrawal of the summons a guardianship summons was taken out, was dealt with by consent, and the wife obtained guardianship of the child and an order for an agreed sum of 12*s*. 6*d*. a week—2*s*. 6*d*. a week more than she could have obtained had she proceeded with her summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4, as amended by the Married Women (Maintenance) Act, 1920, s. 1 (1). Speaking for myself, I do not think that it is possible to ascertain exactly what happened with regard to this matter without exhaustive inquiries, which would not be worth while. I prefer to leave it exactly as it stands, for I do not think that in the result, as I shall try to show, it makes any real difference. It is, at least, certain that there was no adjudication in the ordinary sense of the word. The notes of the evidence show that the summons was marked "Withdrawn," and within a week the order was made under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925.

It is a most unfortunate circumstance that none of that was mentioned at the hearing on Mar. 29, 1949, save only that the wife did refer to the birth of the child and the fact that she had an order under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925. I wish to make it plain that it is expressly disclaimed that any blame attaches to the solicitor who conducted her case. He knew nothing whatever about these previous proceedings, but, after all, it is the wife's case, and, however irrelevant or unimportant she may have thought what had been said at the earlier hearing, it is most unfortunate that it was not mentioned on the later occasion. She did not, apparently, even mention it to her solicitor. To put it at the lowest, though the reasons for her leaving her husband perhaps become somewhat stronger by adding together the stories recorded in the two notes (for there is no substantial inconsistency, and, as I have already indicated, some facts are mentioned in one note which are not in the other), there remains this attempted reconciliation which may or may not suggest that from that time desertion was brought to an end, either because the wife refused to return to her husband unreasonably or because it became a consensual separation. I am not expressing any opinion about the conclusion one way or the other, but the possibility of that inference is obvious and clearly a matter which should have been put to the court which in March, 1949, was asked to determine that there was then a continuing state of desertion.

The second and much more formidable point which has been taken and argued with great force is that on the authorities the withdrawal of the first summons on June 3, 1948, precluded the wife from saying thereafter that she had been deserted by her husband when she left him in April, 1946. That argument originates with Pickavance v. Pickavance (1). In a series of cases attention has been drawn to the distinction between what was actually decided in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) and what was supposed to have been laid down obiter in that case, and, as the decision of the case before us turns one way or the other on what I will call the gloss which has been put on Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) in relation to this jurisdiction, I think it is necessary to examine a little closely what was the real point of that case. It may seem elementary, but I think that the proper method of approach here is to begin with the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, s. 11, which lays down a time-limit in respect of the jurisdiction of justices to deal with any complaint. That includes a complaint by a married woman under the matrimonial code which begins with the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895. The Act of 1848 makes it clear that, as a matter of procedure, the process begins by what is called " the making of a complaint." The complaint is made in respect of something which is called " the matter of the complaint " [see s. 10], and by s. 11 :

> " . . . such complaint shall be made . . . within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint . . . arose."

The section, therefore, draws the plainest distinction between what is called " the matter of the complaint " and " the making of the complaint " which is the physical process initiating the jurisdiction of the court on which the court may issue a summons, thereby bringing the defendant before the court. It is obvious that the matter of the complaint must necessarily precede in point of time the making of the complaint, and, in relation to the matrimonial jurisdiction with which we are concerned, it is very necessary (speaking generally), to draw the next important distinction, which is between matters of complaint which in their nature are continuing and matters of complaint which in their nature must have come to an end at some definite point of time. The simplest illustration (and one which is directly in point in connection with Pickavance v. Pickavance (1)) is the distinction between a case of persistent cruelty, on the one hand, and a case of desertion, on the other hand. Desertion—I am again speaking generally—is a continuing offence, and, once it is shown to have begun and not to have been interrupted, the question of a time-limit preventing the making of a complaint otherwise than within six calendar months from the time when the matter of the complaint arose does not come into the question, because it is always possible, so long as the desertion continues, to say that the matter of complaint arises within six months. It is, however, quite otherwise in practically every case of a course of persistent cruelty. Speaking generally, a course of persistent cruelty must have an ingredient which is the last of the series—which must be, in other words, the end of the " matter of the complaint " —and, when six months from that point of time has elapsed, it is too late to make a complaint before a court of summary jurisdiction and too late for the court, if such a complaint is made, to issue a summons and so to found its jurisdiction.

With these elementary considerations in mind, I come back to Pickavance v. Pickavance (1), which was a case of persistent cruelty. The headnote reads :

> " The withdrawal of a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, has the effect of putting an end to the complaint in respect of which it is issued, and, after the withdrawal, no fresh summons can be issued upon the same cause of complaint."

I emphasise the word " complaint " and pause there to make another general observation. I have already pointed out that in the case of a continuing offence the time-limit, in the nature of things, cannot apply, but there is the intermediate case where, though the offence is one which must come to an end on a particular date, the complaint may be made well within the six months and the summons issued thereon be heard well within the six months and be withdrawn in time for another complaint to be made, also within the six months. At the moment I am concerned to show that, in my opinion, the court which decided Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) never even considered that possible case, and that the headnote, in so far as it says that after the withdrawal no further summons can be issued on the same "cause of complaint," goes too far. In that case (without going into detail) the first complaint in respect of the persistent cruelty was within time. The summons issued thereupon was withdrawn and a fresh complaint was made, on which the later summons was issued, outside the six months time-limit. It was not suggested in the argument that there was any question of estoppel per rem judicatam or, in particular, that the doctrine of autrefois acquit applied. On the contrary, the whole argument was that, as the parties had not been living together for fourteen months before the second complaint was dealt with, and that complaint had not been made within six months, the justices had no jurisdiction, and, in my opinion, but for one sentence in the judgment, that, and nothing else than that, was what was in the minds of the learned judges who decided that case. Both in his observations before adjourning for consideration, and in the opening sentence of his judgment ([1901] P. 63), Sir Francis Jeune, P., referred to the question whether the withdrawal of the summons amounted to a complete withdrawal of the complaint so that it could not be proceeded on, and not to the question whether it amounted to an estoppel per rem judicatam or a previous acquittal on the cause of complaint. In my opinion, he was dealing purely with the machinery point—that, on the withdrawal of the summons, the complaint made, on which the summons was issued, ceased to exist, and some fresh complaint was necessary, and, as the fresh complaint could only be made out of time, the justices had no jurisdiction. The only ground on which the more serious implication which has been directed to this decision is based is one sentence in his judgment (ibid., 64). After calling attention to the important fact > ". . . that the withdrawal of a summons can only take place by leave of the justices or magistrate : a complainant cannot put an end to a criminal proceeding except by leave of the court, and if that leave is given and the summons is withdrawn that amounts to consent by the court . . ."

he added :

> ". . . and that involves the obvious effect that the complaint upon which the summons was founded necessarily falls to the ground."

There the learned President clearly meant to refer to the physical fact of making the complaint, not to the matter of the complaint, but he then added (ibid):

> "The court, having once given its consent to the withdrawal, cannot be competent to revive it again by issuing a fresh summons on the same ground."

That is the sentence which has given rise, in my opinion, to the whole of the confusion. Applied to the facts of that particular case, it need mean nothing more than that the justices could not entertain a fresh complaint on the same ground out of time. I do not believe that the court were thinking of autrefois acquit or estoppel per rem judicatam at all. It is clear, as has been pointed out over and over again, that the decision was simply on the question that the second complaint was out of time, and the summons issued on it, therefore, gave the justices no jurisdiction. There is not the slightest doubt that a gloss has been put on that judgment, it being suggested that Sir Francis Jeune, P., and Gorell Barnes, J., were saying that in all the circumstances, even though a fresh complaint could be made and a fresh summons issued within time, the withdrawal of the first summons gave rise to the plea of autrefois acquit and to an estoppel per rem judicatam.

That gloss on the decision in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) was referred to in R. (McDonnell) v. Tyrone JJ. (2), an Irish case, in which a summons for poaching had not been proceeded with and another one was issued, and it was held that the court could proceed to conviction notwithstanding the withdrawal of the previous summons. But the point is this. In his judgment PALLES, C.B., drew the distinction between the real decision in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) A (viz., that the complaint on which the summons was issued was out of time) and what I call the gloss on the judgment in that case, and said ([1912] 2 I.R. 49) :

> " If, however, we apply the principle laid down in that decision to the withdrawal of any summons for a criminal offence, we would impose a fetter upon the administration by justices of the criminal law, which derives no B support either from statute or from analogy in the common law ; and to do so would, in my opinion, be opposed to the long line of authorities which define and limit the application of the common law pleas of ' autrefois convict ' and ' autrefois acquit.' "

He made it quite plain that he was not prepared to follow what he supposed was the reasoning on which the decision in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) was based.

C That brings me to the decision of this court in Hopkins v. Hopkins (3), the other case with which we must deal. It is only necessary to add that, by the time Hopkins v. Hopkins (3) came to be decided, a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division in Davis v. Morton (4) had held that the withdrawal of a summons in the course of proceedings which had become irregular because the defendant had not been informed of his right to be tried by a jury, as required by the D Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17 (2), did not prevent further proceedings, regularly instituted, on the same subject-matter. The point is sufficiently summarised in the last paragraph of the headnote in Davis v. Morton (4) :

> " The dictum in Pickavance v. Pickavance ([1901] P. 64), that the withdrawal of a summons by leave of the court puts an end to the complaint E upon which the summons is founded, does not apply where the withdrawal is owing to a technical informality in the proceedings on the hearing of the complaint."

That, as I have already pointed out in another form, omits to notice the distinction between the withdrawal of a complaint which is in time and substituting for it the making of a complaint which is out of time, and the case where, though F the first complaint is withdrawn, another one within time is substituted. Hopkins v. Hopkins (3) was a case, again, of persistent cruelty. There had been altogether three summonses. We may treat the first as irrelevant, because it is reasonably clear from the judgment that there had been a resumption of cohabitation and, presumably, some fresh acts of alleged cruelty after the issue of that summons. The two that mattered were two summonses issued respectively on Apr. 11 and G July 4, 1914. The April summons was withdrawn, and the question was whether the order based on the July summons could stand, as both the summonses related to what was admitted to be identically the same course of persistent cruelty. After stating the history of the summonses, SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., said ([1914] P. 283) :

> H " The facts in this case are very similar to those in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1)."

If the view I have expressed is right, they were essentially different in that there is nothing to show that, in respect of the alleged course of persistent cruelty, the July summons and the complaint on which it was based were not as much in time as had been the April summons and the complaint on which that was based. The learned President read at length the passage in R. (McDonnell) v. Tyrone JJ. (2) to which I have already alluded, and said ([1914] P. 285) that he agreed with it, and he referred also to Davis v. Morton (4), in which the Tyrone case (2) had been approved. Then he said (ibid) :

> " Upon the whole I think we ought in cases between husband and wife not to depart from the opinion solemnly expressed by our two eminent predecessors. But it is not every withdrawal of a summons that necessarily disposes of the right of a wife on similar facts to take further proceedings. The withdrawal might be on conditions. In this case the justices seem to have been under a complete misapprehension when they say the first summons was adjourned. It was withdrawn and it is so marked. It was withdrawn absolutely, and without conditions. In these circumstances we are of opinion that the last summons should have been dismissed."

There is an illustration of a summons withdrawn on conditions in Molesworth v. Molesworth (5), a decision of this court, where we held that, whatever be the rights or wrongs of the decision in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1), it did not cover the case with which we were then dealing, where the withdrawal had clearly been on conditions.

To return to the judgment in Hopkins v. Hopkins (3), Bargrave Deane, J., made it plain that, in his view of the matter, Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) established estoppel per rem judicatam, as he said ([1914] P. 285) :

> " So far as causes of complaint between husband and wife under this particular Act are withdrawn unconditionally, husbands ought to be for ever relieved from the same cause of complaint under this Act."

Observe that he spoke of the same " cause of complaint," and not the same " complaint." He proceeded (ibid.) :

> " I do not say that a wife should not be able to bring up here, to obtain relief, coupled with adultery, charges which may have been withdrawn in a court of summary jurisdiction ; but such withdrawal should, in my opinion, be an estoppel from bringing up again the same cause of complaint before the justices."

There is the problem in its naked simplicity, and the problem is whether or not there is some different code of law applicable to matrimonial matters, though dealt with under a summary jurisdiction code of general application. The position as I see it is this. If Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) has, as I think, been misunderstood and a false gloss has been put on it, then we are plainly absolved from following Hopkins v. Hopkins (3). If, on the other hand, Hopkins v. Hopkins (3) rightly interpreted the decision in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) and so is a decision of this court, based on dicta not necessary to the decision of Pickavance v. Pickavance (1), ought we to follow it although it is plainly shown to be out of line with the law regarding estoppel per rem judicatam in relation to both civil and criminal cases ? I say " plainly shown ", because the decision in R. (McDonnell) v. Tyrone JJ. (2) has been followed not only in Davis v. Morton (4), but even more recently in Owens v. Minoprio (6), and has received very marked approval from a Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division in R. v. Seddon (7). The only thing, in my opinion, that gives one any ground for hesitation is that every case in which Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) has been commented on has been dealt with on the ground, as in Davis v. Morton (4), that there was a technical defect in the procedure which had developed at the moment when the summons was withdrawn, or, as in Owens v. Minoprio (6), that the information had been laid by the wrong prosecutor. In Owens v. Minoprio (6), after referring to R. (McDonnell) v. Tyrone JJ. (2) and Davies v. Morton (4), Viscount Caldecote, C.J., said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 32) :

> " Those two cases are actually decisions to the effect that, when a withdrawal of a summons is permitted by magistrates, not on the merits of the case, but on a preliminary point, the withdrawal is not equivalent to a dismissal or an acquittal. That last statement was made by PICKFORD, J., in his judgment in Davis v. Morton (4). The basic principle of the plea autrefois acquit is that the person charged has already been put in peril, and no man is to be put in peril twice in respect of the one charge. In this present case, there was no withdrawal of the summons upon the merits. There was a withdrawal, with the consent of the magistrates, in consequence of an informality in the proceedings."

VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., added that he thought it was highly desirable that Pickavance v. Pickavance (1) should no longer appear in the textbooks as an authority to the effect stated by the justices in their first decision, and that it should be appreciated that the only decision in that case was that the information was out of time.

It is argued, first, that it is impossible to discover from the very full report of R. (McDonnell) v. Tyrone JJ. (2) what was the preliminary point on which it was suggested that the first summons had been withdrawn. I admit that it is impossible to answer that question from the report, and VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., seems to have been in error in that respect. Secondly, it is suggested that from the sentence in which VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., says that, when a withdrawal of a summons is permitted by justices, not on the merits of the case but on a preliminary point, the withdrawal is not equivalent to a dismissal or an acquittal, it follows that, if the withdrawal was not on a preliminary point, but was on the merits of the case, it is the equivalent of a dismissal or an acquittal. I do not think that that is the right inference to be drawn from that expression of VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J. In my opinion, to hold that for some reason peculiar to matrimonial cases a withdrawal, not leading to an adverse adjudication, but a mere withdrawal, whether on a preliminary point or during the hearing of the case, operates in any sense as an estoppel per rem judicatam would be to place the matrimonial jurisdiction in a state of unwarranted isolation in the general system of law. In my opinion, there is no warranty for that, and I do not think that we ought to feel ourselves bound by the decision in Hopkins v. Hopkins (3), based, as I think it is, on a misapprehension of what was really said by the court in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1), to come to any such conclusion.

In my opinion, therefore, the justices had jurisdiction to deal with the summons which was before them on Mar. 29, because, as I have already indicated, the matter of complaint being a continuing desertion, no question of time-limit in respect of the making of the complaint arose. I feel bound to say, however, that, having regard to the non-disclosure of the earlier proceedings, and, in particular, of that element in the evidence in the previous proceedings which related to the suggested reconciliation, I do not think that this order can stand. In my opinion, the proper order is that the appeal should be allowed, and the wife's summons remitted for re-hearing by a fresh panel of the Manchester justices, it being plainly understood that, in determining the matter, we are not expressing any opinion whatever on the merits and that the justices are com- justices, it being plainly understood that we are not expressing any opinion whatever on the merits and that the justices are completely unfettered in coming to a just decision on the facts as a whole.

BARNARD, J.: I entirely agree with what my Lord has said as to the true interpretation to be put on the judgment of this court in Pickavance v. Pickavance (1). My Lord has dealt with the misconception of that judgment in later cases, and I do not think that it is necessary for me to add anything to what he has said. This court has, however, stated from time to time that the principles which are applicable to the Divorce Division should be applied by justices when exercising their matrimonial jurisdiction. It is, therefore, not unimportant to consider how the Divorce Division has dealt with the dismissal of a petition other than when the subject-matter of the petition was adjudicated on. I shall refer only to Hall v. Hall and Richardson (8). There the husband petitioner filed a petition for dissolution of marriage in May, 1873. In July, 1874, on the petitioner's application and with the consent of the respondent and the co-respondent, the petition was dismissed before hearing. In October, 1878, the petitioner filed a fresh petition, which included the charges of adultery against the respondent and the co-respondent contained in the first petition, and it was held that he was not precluded by the dismissal of the first petition from repeating those charges. At the commencement of his judgment, Sir James Hannen, P., said (48 L.J.P. 59):

> "I am of opinion that the answer which has been proposed to be set up to this petition is bad in law. It amounts to a plea of res judicata, that is to say, the respondent alleges that the question of her guilt has been determined by a judgment of this court in her favour. I am of opinion that neither in fact nor in form has there been any such adjudication."

That case was referred to with approval by the Court of Appeal in Goldblum v. Goldblum (9). In the present case there was clearly no adjudication. The summons was withdrawn. There is no evidence to suggest that the matter of the complaint, which in this case was desertion, was ever withdrawn, and, there being no adjudication on that, I agree that in March the justices had jurisdiction to deal with the matter. For other reasons, however, which my Lord has given, this appeal must be allowed, and the case must go back to the justices for a re-hearing.

Appeal allowed, order set aside and wife's summons remitted to justices for re-hearing. Wife to have costs not exceeding £20, no taxation by consent.

R. B. POLICIES AT LLOYD'S v. BUTLER.

[King's Bench Division (Streatfeild, J.), June 23, 24, 1949.]

Limitation of Action—Detinue—Date of accrual of action—Car stolen by unknown person—Discovery in hands of innocent purchaser for value—Action for recovery brought seven years after theft—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), ss. 2 (1), 3 (1).

On June 27, 1940, a car, the property of the plaintiffs, was stolen by an unknown person. Subsequently it passed through a line of intermediate purchasers to the defendant, an innocent purchaser for good consideration in whose hands it was identified in January, 1947. On July 16, 1947, the plaintiffs commenced an action in which they claimed the return of the car and, alternatively, damages for its detention. The defendant pleaded that the action was barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 2 (1), having been "brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued," and by s. 3 (1) under which: "Where any cause of action in respect of the conversion or wrongful detention of a chattel has accrued to any person and, before he recovers possession of the chattel, a further conversion or wrongful detention takes place, no action shall be brought in respect of the further conversion or detention after the expiration of six years from the accrual of the cause of action in respect of the original conversion or detention."

HELD : although the original owners had not known who had stolen the car in 1940 and so had been unable to bring an action for detention, their cause of action had accrued when the car was stolen, and the present action was statute-barred.

TRIAL of a preliminary issue in an action for the return of a motor car alleged C to be wrongfully detained by the defendant, and, alternatively, for the value of the car or for damages for its wrongful detention.

The car had been stolen from the plaintiffs on June 27, 1940, and the action was commenced on July 16, 1947, more than six years after its loss. The defendant pleaded the Limitation Act, 1939, ss. 2 (1) and 3 (1), but the plaintiffs contended that their cause of action had not accrued in June, 1940, because they had not known who had stolen they car and so had been unable D to bring an action in respect of it. STREATFEILD, J., found for the defendant.

Fenton Atkinson for the plaintiffs.

L. S. Hart Jackson for the defendant.

STREATFEILD, J. : This is an action brought by R. B. Policies at Lloyd's against Mr. Alfred Butler by a writ issued on July 16, 1947, claiming E the return of a motor-car which, they allege, has been wrongfully detained by the defendant. When the motor-car was first in the plaintiffs' possession it had the registration number, JD 6412, and it was stolen from them by some person or persons unknown on June 27, 1940. In January, 1947, the car, then bearing the registration number ALN 765, was found in the possession of the defendant, having passed to him through a line of intermediate F purchasers during the previous seven years. It is pleaded in the defence that the plaintiffs' cause of action is barred under the Limitation Act, 1939, by s. 2 (1) of which no action shall be brought " after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued " in cases, among others, of actions founded on tort, which this was. That issue has been set down for trial as a preliminary issue under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2.

G The plaintiffs were the owners of this car and the defendant was an innocent purchaser who acquired it for good consideration and in good faith many years after it was stolen. That, of course, can only weigh with me to the extent that one of the matters to be taken into account where there is any doubt or ambiguity in an Act of Parliament is that natural justice shall be done, another principle being that, where there is any doubt about the wording of H an Act of Parliament, the words are to be understood in a way which harmonises with the policy of the Act.

In deciding this issue, it becomes necessary to determine the date on which the cause of action accrued. If it accrued to the plaintiffs as soon as the motor-car was stolen so that they then had a cause of action against the thief for conversion or detention, it is contended that under s. 3 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, any subsequent detention cannot be the subject of any action. That sub-section provides :

> "Where any cause of action in respect of the conversion or wrongful detention of a chattel has accrued to any person and, before he recovers possession of the chattel, a further conversion or wrongful detention takes place, no action shall be brought in respect of the further conversion or detention after the expiration of six years from the accrual of the cause of action in respect of the original conversion or detention."

Therefore, if a cause of action did accrue at the date of the theft and, before the plaintiffs recovered possession, there were further conversions by a line of persons of whom the defendant was the last, no cause of action will lie against any of them after six years from the date of the original cause of action. Sub-section (2) goes on to introduce what is new law : A

> "Where any such cause of action has accrued to any person and the period prescribed for bringing that action and for bringing any action in respect of such a further conversion or wrongful detention as aforesaid has expired and he has not during that period recovered possession of the chattel, the title of that person to the chattel shall be extinguished." B

When does a cause of action accrue ? In the present case when the thief stole this car in 1940, clearly he converted it to his own use, and, apart from his prosecution for the felony, if he had been known, undoubtedly an action could have been brought against him for conversion of the car then. I have to determine whether it is necessary that there should be an actual, known, and available defendant to such an action before it can be said that the cause of action has accrued so as to fulfil the phrase used in s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1939. Some persons, such as ambassadors enjoying diplomatic privilege, may commit torts such as negligence or conversion without being liable to an action although the act, if done by an ordinary individual, would have amounted to a cause of action. No cause of action against them would accrue until after they had ceased to be ambassadors, when, if they could be sued by writ, they might be liable. But those are special circumstances. C D

Various definitions have been made of an accrual of a cause of action, and I start with the proposition, which has been submitted by counsel for the plaintiffs, in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 20, at p. 618, para. 777 : E

> "A cause of action cannot accrue unless there be a person in existence capable of suing and another person in existence who can be sued."

Is it to be said, because a person is not traceable or is not known, that he is not in existence, and cannot be sued ? If the thief in the present case had been traceable, he could have been sued, so I doubt whether on that definition it can be said that there was no person in existence who could have been sued. It was, no doubt, a misfortune to the plaintiffs that they could not find a defendant whose name they could insert in a writ, but the fact remains that every other ingredient of the cause of action was present. Their car had been converted and a statement of claim could have been drawn without difficulty if the name of the defendant had been known. F G

Did the cause of action not accrue merely because there was an absent and unknown defendant whose name could not be inserted on the writ ? It is of assistance to examine the position arising under s. 26 of the Act of 1939, which provides : H

> "Where, in the case of any action for which a period of limitation is prescribed by this Act . . . (b) the right of action is concealed by the fraud of any such person as aforesaid . . . the period of limitation shall not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the fraud . . . or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it . . ."

A proviso protects third parties who take for valuable consideration and without notice. From the wording of s. 26 it seems to me that time runs in an ordinary case even though the plaintiff is ignorant that he has a right of action, and that the section was inserted solely to prevent time running against a plaintiff who was not aware of the fact that he had a right of action because it was concealed from him by the fraud of the defendant. The section does not say the cause of action shall accrue for the first time on the discovery of the fraud ; but only that time "shall not begin to run" until that event, and its language is somewhat different from that of COLERIDGE, C.J., in Gibbs v. Guild (1), an illustration of a right of action accruing to a plaintiff although he is unaware of the fact that that right of action has accrued. Section 26 is the only provision in the Act of 1939 where a special exception of this nature is made. Nowhere is an exception to be found in favour of a person who cannot give effect to an otherwise perfect cause of action because of an unknown defendant. Prima facie, therefore, if there is a cause of action (as there clearly was here the moment this motor-car was stolen), time begins to run as from that moment, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff is ignorant of the identity of the thief.

Another illustration of time running against a plaintiff who is unaware of his rights is to be found under the statute, 4 and 5 Anne, c. 3, s. 19. Under that Act, which has now been repealed, if at the time of the accrual of a cause of action the defendant was overseas, time did not begin to run against him until he returned to this country, but that did not apply when he disappeared overseas after the cause of action had accrued and remained there, in which case time ran against the plaintiff continuously although he could sue the defendant. Taking the case visualised by s. 19, if a defendant returned to this country, even though only for a few hours and though his return was unknown to the plaintiff, time began to run in his favour. That was held in Gregory v. Hurrill (2), where the defendant was in a sailing vessel returning from overseas to Scandinavia, and, while the ship was waiting for more favourable winds, he put ashore at the port of Deal to leave some message for the Scandinavian consul. It was held that that visit of a few hours at Deal constituted a return by the defendant to this country so that the time began to run in his favour against the plaintiff, although the latter was unaware of it.

Can it be said, therefore, that, the cause of action being otherwise complete, the ignorance of the plaintiff regarding the person who committed the conversion is sufficient to prevent the accrual of that cause of action ? I think not, and I agree with the argument of counsel for the defendant. It would lead to appalling results if someone, having lost a watch and discovered it fifty or sixty years later in the possession of a wholly innocent person who had bought it many years previously, was able to bring an action for its recovery merely because he did not know who the thief was fifty or sixty years before. I cannot think that that is the policy of the Limitation Act, 1939, or that to construe its words in favour of the plaintiffs would be to construe them in a way which harmonises with the intention of the legislature. I agree that one of the principles of the Act is that those who go to sleep on their claims should not be assisted by the courts in recovering their property. But another equally important principle is that there shall be an end of these matters, and that there shall be protection against stale demands. In A'Court v. Cross (3), BEST, C.J., referred to the policy of the Limitation Act, 1623, in this way (3 Bing. 332) :

> "It has been supposed that the legislature only meant to protect persons who had paid their debts, but from length of time had lost or destroyed the proof of payment. From the title of the Act to the last section, every word of it shows that it was not passed on this narrow ground. It is, as I have heard it often called by great judges, an act of peace. Long dormant claims have often more of cruelty than of justice in them."

I am not suggesting that the plaintiffs here are guilty of heartless or cruel conduct, but a claim made seven or eight years after the loss of the car against a perfectly innocent holder who has given good consideration for it without any knowledge that it was stolen does not seem just. I think that one object of this Act is to prevent injustices of that kind and to protect innocent people against demands which are made many years afterwards. In my view, the proper construction of the words " the action accrued " involves the finding that the cause of action here accrued in 1940 when the car was stolen from the plaintiffs. This preliminary point must, therefore, be decided in favour of the defendant.

[King's Bench Division (Streatfeild, J.), June 23, 1949.]

Indemnity—Tenancy agreement—Indemnity by tenant—Loss " which but for the tenancy . . . would not have arisen "—Premises adjacent to railway—Fire caused by locomotive—Damage to goods—Applicability of indemnity clause.

Goods stored in a railway warehouse let to a tenant were damaged by fire and the tenant brought an action against the Railway Executive alleging that the accident was due to their negligence because a spark or other combustible material ejected from their railway engine had caused the fire. The Railway Executive set up a clause in the tenancy agreement providing that : " The tenant shall be responsible for and shall release and indemnify the company and their servants and agents from and against all liability for personal injury (whether fatal or otherwise) loss of or damage to property and any other loss damage costs and expenses however caused or incurred (whether by the act or neglect of the company or their servants or agents or not) which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen."

Held : the words " but for the tenancy hereby created " limited the purview of the indemnity to damage arising out of or in connection with the occupation under the tenancy or anything done in pursuance of the tenancy, and did not relieve the Railway Executive from liability for negligence of the kind alleged, if established.

TRIAL of a preliminary issue in an action for damages for negligence, or, alternatively, for damages on the ground that the defendants, the Railway Executive, had brought fire on to their property and allowed it to escape on to the plaintiffs' adjoining property and their goods.

The plaintiffs alleged that their goods, which were stored in a warehouse adjacent to the railway, had been damaged by fire through the negligence of the defendants. The defendants contended that, even if this were proved, they were entitled to be released and indemnified from and against all liability by one of the plaintiffs, who were tenants of the warehouse, by virtue of a clause in the tenancy agreement. STREATFEILD, J., held that the clause did not relieve the defendants from liability.

Beney, K.C., and Felix Denny for the plaintiffs.
Gardiner, K.C., and Douglas Lowe for the defendants.

STREATFEILD, J. : This matter arises out of an action brought by John Lee & Son (Grantham), Ltd., and Arthur Richardson & Son, Ltd., against the Railway Executive. The statement of claim alleges that the two plaintiffs have suffered damage to their goods as the result of the negligence of the Railway Executive in the operation of a shunting engine on Aug. 21, 1947, when a spark or sparks or other combustible material was or were ejected from the engine and set fire to the goods in the first plaintiffs' warehouse in which the goods of both plaintiffs were stored. The defence is a denial of negligence and a denial that any act of the defendants' servants caused this accident. It also raises a point as to the construction of a clause in a tenancy agreement between the predecessors of the defendants and the first plaintiffs under which, it is contended, the first plaintiffs are bound to indemnify the defendants and release them from liability in respect of both their own claim and also that of the second plaintiffs. That matter has been referred to the court, under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2, for determination as a preliminary issue.

The clause in the agreement (which is dated June 13, 1939), is one of a number of clauses governing the occupation by the first plaintiffs of warehouse premises immediately adjoining the defendants' railway at Grantham. It is part and parcel of a tenancy agreement, though that mere fact does not necessarily prevent its operation outside the tenancy agreement. The clause reads as follows :

> "The tenant shall be responsible for and shall release and indemnify the company and their servants and agents from and against all liability for personal injury (whether fatal or otherwise) loss of or damage to property and any other loss damage costs and expenses however caused or incurred (whether by the act or neglect of the company or their servants or agents or not) which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen."

It is conceded that if the words had stopped at the end of the second parenthesis —that is after the words " the company or their servants or agents or not "— that would have exactly covered the situation which has arisen here. They would have been quite unqualified and would have covered a negligent act caused by the defendants themselves setting fire to the plaintiffs' goods on these premises, but it is contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that the last words form the key to the construction of this clause and are words of qualification or limitation of the sort of liability or damage which is intended to be covered. It is not damage in general which is referred to, but it must be damage " which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen."

To construe those words, I think it right to say, as was said by LORD ATKIN in Furness Shipbuilding Co. v. London and North Eastern Ry. (1) and also by TUCKER, J., in Great Western Ry. Co. v. Port Talbot Dry Dock Co. (2), that not very much assistance is to be derived from the study of other cases of construction where somewhat similar words, but not necessarily exactly similar words, in different situations have fallen to be construed. In the end it always comes back to the proper construction of the words themselves in the agreement in which they occur. Under this agreement the predecessors of the defendants let the premises to the first plaintiffs for a rent of £83 a year. In cl. 4 the tenants agree to pay the company for any services rendered in transferring goods to or from the premises. In cl. 5 there are restrictions on the use of the premises and on what goods shall be manufactured or stored there. In cl. 8 there is a kind of "tie" agreement, whereby the tenants are only to store in those premises goods which are intended to be carried over the railway company's lines. In cl. 9 the railway company reserve the right to carry pipes, cables, or wires under, through, or over the premises and to enter upon the premises for the purpose of executing such works.

I have come to the conclusion that counsel for the plaintiffs is right in contending that the words " which but for " down to the end of cl. 10 are words of limitation. I think the clause means that the tenants shall be responsible for, and shall release and indemnify the company against, liability for damage to property, however caused, even by the neglect of the company, but limited by these words " which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen." Without doubt the latter part of that phrase, " anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof " certainly would cover operations such as are visualised in cl. 9. Under cl. 9 the company might enter on the premises and lay pipes or cables or wires through or over or under them. That would be something which was done pursuant to a provision of the tenancy, and it would clearly be covered by those words, " anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof " if the company were to cause any damage in the process of installing pipes or cables. I think that the preceding words, " but for the tenancy hereby created," must be construed in relation to the whole phrase. According to the rule of ejusdem generis, that whole phrase must be read together, and some light is thrown on the meaning of the words " but for the tenancy hereby created " by the following words. Those words " but for the tenancy hereby created " are, in fact, the equivalent of words such as " arising out of or in connection with the plaintiffs' occupation under the tenancy." One must not, of course, insert words which are not there, but I think that the whole phrase means that the damage which is visualised is the sort of damage which arises out of the occupation under the tenancy, or anything, for instance, under cl. 9, which is done in pursuance of the provisions of it.

That brings me to the consideration of the case which I think throws most light on the present matter—an authority on which counsel for the plaintiff relies : Great Western Ry. Co. v. Durnford (James) & Sons, Ltd. (3). There the defendants took a lease of premises from the railway company who for the purpose of the agreement gave the defendants permission to use a portable gangway which was, in effect, part of the premises, though having nothing to do with the work done there. The words which fell to be construed were :

> "In consideration of the within-named company . . . permitting the within-named lessees . . . to use the portable gangway with brackets recently erected by the said lessees upon the premises within described and projecting over the company's premises for the purpose of loading traffic into trucks on the sidings adjacent to the within described premises, the said lessees hereby agree and undertake to indemnify the said company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever, whether in respect of damage to person or property, arising out of or in connection with the existence or user of the said gangway and brackets."

LORD SUMNER said (139 L.T. 147) :

> "Again, the liability may arise out of or it may arise in connection with—but it must still arise, and for legal purposes that must mean arise causally, and, since the matter dealt with is a legal liability, that must mean in such causal connection as is required to make somebody liable, who has to be answerable for the apparatus. It is contemplated that the railway company is liable and that its liability has been caused by the presence or the use of the gangway. In the present case the action of the engine-driver was what caused the railway company to be liable. It is said that if the lorry had not been there—a fortiori if it had not existed—it would not have been knocked off the gangway, but for legal purposes the lorry was not a contributing cause of the injury to it, but only a causa sine qua non. Moreover, it was there pursuant to the terms of the licence for use in a joint operation with the railway company and, as the clause in question is not a clause of defeasance or of exception but only a foundation for an independent cross-claim, I think that there was an implied contractual obligation on the railway company to be reasonably careful not to injure it. Hence the negligence in itself formed a cause of action, and the damage to the lorry was merely the measure of the amount recoverable. The liability was, as a matter of causation, wholly due to the acts and defaults of the railway company and did not arise at all out of or in connection with the presence or the user of the gangway."

LORD WARRINGTON (ibid., 148), said :

> "Did, then, the damage arise out of or in connection with the user of the gangway or brackets ? Inasmuch as the respondents alone and persons authorised by them can lawfully use the gangway, the words seem to me to assume that it is an act of the respondents themselves in the course of or in connection with the user of the gangway from which the damage arises. In the present case the damage arose not from any act of the respondents in the course of or in connection with the user, but from that of the appellants' servants in driving the box truck against the overhanging lorry. It is true that if the lorry had not been there the damage would not have arisen, but on the other hand but for the act of the appellants' servants the lorry, though in its actual position, would not have been injured, and it seems to me that in determining the present question it is the causa causans alone which has to be regarded."

In my view, although the words are not the same (and I do not rely on that or any other case as a guide for the construction of this phrase), these words must refer, as I have said, to something which arises out of the occupation under the tenancy or is done pursuant to the provisions of that tenancy agreement. Although, no doubt, it can be said that no damage would have been caused to the plaintiffs' goods unless they had taken this tenancy and had had the goods on the premises, the matter falls, on the construction of this phrase, to be determined in view of those passages to which I have referred in Great Western Ry. Co. v. Durnford (James) & Sons, Ltd. (3), and what was the causa causans. I do not think it can be said that this agreement can be construed so widely that the plaintiffs took these premises at their peril. The words in question, as I have indicated, have limited the purview of the indemnity to those cases where the damage is the result of the actual occupation of the tenancy or something done in pursuance of it. As, for this purpose, I must assume that the plaintiffs are in a position to establish that their damage was done, not as the result of their occupation or something done in pursuance of their occupation, but as the result of negligent operations of the defendants, it follows that this preliminary point must be determined in their favour. The preliminary point fails.

Order accordingly. Costs reserved to the trial judge.

Sale of Land—Specific performance—Rescission of contract—Notice to complete served by vendor—Purchaser willing and able to complete on date fixed—Vendor unable to do so—Return of deposit money—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 49 (2).

On Dec. 10, 1947, a contract was concluded for the sale of certain property. On Mar. 31, 1948, the vendor sent to the purchaser a notice to complete within 14 days. On Apr. 14, the date fixed by the notice as the final date for completion, the purchaser was ready and able to complete, but the vendor was unable to do so. On the same day, the purchaser sent to the vendor a three days' notice to complete, but the vendor was unable to comply with it, though she was in a position to complete on Apr. 30. In an action by the purchaser claiming a declaration that he was entitled to rescind the contract and a counter-action by the vendor claiming an order for specific performance:

Held: (i) by her notice of Mar. 31, the vendor made completion by Apr. 14 an essential term of the contract so that the rule of equity that the time fixed for completion was not of the essence of the contract no longer applied; as the purchaser was bound by the notice, the vendor, having given the notice, was also bound thereby; and, as she was unable to complete on the day fixed, she was not entitled to an order for specific performance of the contract.

(ii) as an order for specific performance was refused to the vendor, the purchaser was entitled to an order under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 49 (2), for the return of his deposit.

CONSOLIDATED ACTION.

The plaintiff (the purchaser) entered into a contract to purchase certain property from the defendant (the vendor) and was ready and able to complete on the date for completion which had been fixed by the vendor by a notice to complete. The vendor, however, was unable to complete on the date fixed, and the purchaser brought an action claiming (a) a declaration that he was entitled to rescind, and (b) the return of his deposit money. The vendor brought a cross-action claiming an order for specific performance. DANCKWERTS, J., held that the vendor was not entitled to an order for specific performance and that the purchaser was entitled to an order for the return of his deposit money. The facts appear in the judgment.

Richmount for the purchaser.

F. E. Skone James for the vendor.

DANCKWERTS, J. : On Sept. 29, 1947, Miss Monohan, who is the defendant in the first, and plaintiff in the second, of these two actions, which have been consolidated, entered into a contract to purchase certain property known as No. 20, Wykeham Road, Hendon, from Mr. Algernon Nairne Gray. On Oct. 5, 1947, Mr. Gray died, having appointed Barclays Bank, Ltd. and Horace Edgar Gray to be the executors of his will. On Dec. 10, 1947, Miss Monohan concluded a contract with Mr. Finkielkraut, who is the plaintiff in the first action and the defendant in the second, to sell to him all except a small portion of the property. The purchase price in the original contract was £4,250 and the purchase price to the purchaser was £5,350. It was obvious that some delay would occur before probate of Mr. Gray's will could be obtained and the sale to the purchaser could be completed, but for the present purpose the material part of the history starts on Mar. 18, 1948, when Mr. Fishman, the solicitor acting for the purchaser, wrote informing Mr. Landy, the solicitor acting for the vendor, that the mortgagee who had been expected to provide part of the purchase price was not prepared to go on. Thereupon Mr. Landy sent a letter threatening to serve a notice which, he said, might result in the forfeiture of the deposit, and on Mar. 31 he sent a notice to complete within fourteen days from the date of the receipt of the notice, i.e., by Apr. 14, 1948. On Apr. 2, 1948, an engrossment of the conveyance to the purchaser was sent by his solicitor, Mr. Fishman, to Mr. Landy, and on Apr. 5, 1948, that engrossment was sent by Mr. Landy to the vendor for execution, with a letter so that it could be sent on for execution by the executors of Mr. Gray's will. It appears that it was, in fact, sent on to the solicitor acting for the executors. At this stage a very unfortunate thing occurred. The engrossment, as submitted, contained errors, which are quite obvious when they are pointed out, but which, apparently, were not perceived by whoever completed the engrossment, nor by Mr. Fishman, nor by Mr. Landy, nor by the executors' solicitors, as all these persons approved the engrossment in the form in which it was sent. On Apr. 5 Mr. Landy also sent a completion statement to Mr. Fishman, providing for the situation which would arise on Apr. 14, 1948, and on Apr. 7, 1948, the executors' solicitors in their turn sent a completion statement to Mr. Landy. On Apr. 8 Mr. Fishman discovered the errors in the engrossment and telephoned to Mr. Landy. There is a dispute between Mr. Fishman and Mr. Landy whether Mr. Fishman explained what the errors, in fact, were. Mr. Fishman said definitely that he did explain what they were and said that, although purely A matters of drafting, they were substantial, but Mr. Landy said that Mr. Fishman merely said that there were minor errors and did not inform him of their exact nature. On the following day, Apr. 9, 1948, the executors' solicitors telephoned to Mr. Landy and raised a question as to the form in which the consideration should be stated in the two deeds, i.e., the deed which conveyed the greater part of the land to the purchaser, and the other B deed which conveyed a small portion to the vendor. It was quite obvious that the way in which the consideration was expressed was not satisfactory and some alteration would be required. On Apr. 13, Mr. Landy wrote to the executors' solicitors sending an amended conveyance of the small portion of the land to the vendor and on the same day he received a letter from the executors' solicitors, refusing to accept the transaction in the form in C which it had been put forward and requiring one conveyance of the property to the vendor.

On Apr. 14, which was the final date for completion according to the notice sent to the purchaser by Mr. Landy, Mr. Landy told Mr. Fishman over the telephone that it was clear that they could not complete on that date. He was then asked whether he would withdraw the notice which he had given, D and he said that he could not do so, but would not require the purchaser to complete, and that he would give three days' notice to complete within an early period. On the same day, Apr. 14, 1948, at about 5 p.m., Mr. Fishman's clerk came to Mr. Landy's office with three banker's drafts which made up the total amount due for the balance of the purchase price, having regard to the deposit which had already been paid and was in the hands of E the stakeholders. Mr. Fishman said that he produced the letter to the stakeholders to pay over the deposit. Whether or not he did produce it was disputed, but I have no doubt that he had the letter and that, therefore, the purchaser was in a position to complete the purchase on Apr. 14, 1948. His solicitor, however, had already been told by the vendor's solicitor that the completion could not take place owing to the difficulties which had F arisen, and, therefore, it was useless to tender the drafts, although Mr. Landy inspected the drafts and noted down the amounts. At this stage there was a willing vendor (the vendor) and a willing purchaser (the purchaser), and I cannot understand why the two solicitors could not have got together in a reasonable manner and settled the matter without further controversy and so saved the expense of these actions. The difficulties which existed were G not in regard to the title which was perfectly in order. They were merely difficulties in drafting, for which both solicitors must bear responsibility, as they were both parties to the mistakes. One put them forward and the other did not notice them. On the same day, Apr. 14, a three days' notice was given by Mr. Fishman to the vendor to complete the sale. On Apr. 15, Mr. Landy wrote to Mr. Fishman putting forward other and different grounds H for the fact that the vendor was not ready to complete, but stating that she hoped to complete in a day or two. On the same day a letter was written by the executors' solicitors which had the effect of straightening out the difficulties which they had previously raised. They were ready to assist in completing the matter in the way which was necessary. On Apr. 18, 1948, there was another telephone conversation between Mr. Landy and Mr. Fishman, and Mr. Landy's account is that he then understood for the first time the amendments which were required on account of the errors in the original engrossment. On Apr. 19, Mr. Landy wrote to Mr. Fishman pointing out that a further delay would be necessary because of difficulties which might require re-engrossment of the conveyances, and on the same day he wrote to the executors' solicitors, in answer to their letter of Apr. 15, saying what was now necessary. On the next day, Apr. 20, the executors' solicitors wrote to Mr. Landy returning the approved amended engrossment. On Apr. 22, 1948, the purchaser issued the writ in his action, in which he claimed a declaration that he was entitled to rescind and asked for the return of the deposit of £535. On Apr. 30, Mr. Landy wrote to Mr. Fishman, saying that the vendor was now in a position to complete, but on May 4, Mr. Fishman replied that he did not understand Mr. Landy's letter, because his own three days' notice had expired. On May 5 the vendor issued her writ claiming an order for specific performance so as not to be accused of delay in case the statement of claim in the purchaser's action was not delivered promptly.

The question to be decided is whether, owing to the circumstances and history of the case, the vendor in her cross-action is entitled to ask for specific performance. In my opinion, she is not. It is true that this was a contract in which originally the time for completion would not have been regarded by equity as of the essence, but by her notice of Mar. 31, 1948, sent by her solicitor, the vendor made completion by Apr. 14, 1948, an essential term, at any rate on the purchaser's part. Notwithstanding the fact that he or his solicitor was told that completion would not take place, the purchaser was, I think, within his rights in appearing on Apr. 14 to complete the purchase by paying the balance of the purchase money, and it is claimed that he was in a position to do so. In my view, the vendor cannot be heard to say that time was not essential on Apr. 14, 1948. A number of cases were cited, but none of them really touches the point, though they do indicate that, where a party gives a notice requiring completion by a certain date and the date is a reasonable one, the rule of equity that the time fixed for completion is not of the essence of the contract no longer operates: see per LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON ([1915] A.C. 416) in Stickney v. Keeble (1); and the notice does, at any rate, bind the person to whom it was given. If it binds the person to whom it was given, I cannot see why the person who has elected to give such a notice is not also bound. The cases cited: see Stickney v. Keeble (1), Green v. Sevin (2), Smith v. Butler (4), and Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co. (3). Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co. (3) is in certain respects quite a different kind of case. The sale in that case was subject to the approval of the court, and the vendor, the receiver in a debenture holders' action, did not obtain the consent of the court by the date fixed for completion. The consent of the court was treated as an essential condition which had to be fulfilled before the date for completion if the contract was to be enforced. To some extent, therefore, it is rather a special case, but I think it is clear from the judgment of MAUGHAM, J., that, if time is essential, a vendor who is claiming that he is entitled to obtain an order for specific performance must show that he himself was in a position to complete on the date fixed. On the date of completion in the present case the vendor, who is now seeking an order for specific performance, was not in a position to complete. For that reason, in my opinion, the vendor in her cross-action is not entitled to a decree for specific performance, and her action must be dismissed.

The next matter is whether the purchaser is entitled to rescission, or, at any rate, whether I should make an order for the return of the deposit. This seems to me a case in which, as an order for specific performance is refused to the vendor, an order for the return of the deposit should be made under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 49 (2), which is in these terms:

> "Where the court refuses to grant specific performance of a contract, or > in any action for the return of a deposit, the court may, if it thinks fit, order the repayment of any deposit."

In my opinion, justice in this case requires that an order should be made for the return of the deposit to the purchaser, and I make an order accordingly.

There remains the matter of the costs, and I think that it would be an advantage if I were to say what I think about that before I hear what learned counsel have to say. I consider that this was a case in which, if the solicitors had behaved in a more reasonable manner, the expenses of both these actions could have been saved entirely. I think that the solicitors were to blame. It was their error in making, or reading, the drafts, and they were too hasty to stand on strict rights. They made too little attempt to co-operate and settle the matter on a friendly basis, when it was quite obvious that little was required to put the matter right and it could be settled within a few days. It is, of course, unfortunate that these actions will cost their respective clients considerable sums of money in costs. I do not think that it is a case in which it would be right for me to order that either of the parties should pay the other's costs, so the order that I propose to make is that there shall be no order as to costs and that each party should bear his own costs of these actions.

Order for return of deposit to purchaser. Cross-action dismissed. No order as to costs.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), June 28, 1949.]

Variation of Settlement—Proper provision for injured spouse of the marriage—Income of trust fund to be paid to wife if marriage undissolved—Appointment by husband by will in favour of second wife—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 192.

In 1928 the husband and wife were married, and there were no children of the marriage. By cl. 3 of an ante-nuptial settlement, to which the wife was a party, it was provided that after the husband's death, if the intended marriage should be subsisting and undissolved at the date of his death and if the wife should survive him, the trustees were to pay the annual income of the trust fund to the wife during her lifetime. The settlement further provided that, subject to cl. 3, the husband might by deed or will appoint, in favour of any other wife who might survive him, all or any part of the annual income of the fund. On June 27, 1947, the wife was granted a decree nisi on the ground of the husband's adultery, and that decree was made absolute on Aug. 15, 1947. On Aug. 19, 1947, the husband re-married and on Nov. 17 he died. By his will, dated Sept. 14, 1947, he exercised the power of appointment conferred on him by the settlement, partly in favour of the second wife and partly in favour of his sister, and, after the death of the second wife, in favour of his sister's children living at the date of his death. The wife had an annual income of £1,100 and had supported herself since 1931. The husband's only income had been £650 derived from the settlement. The second wife was without income apart from the provision made for her under the will, and the sister had an income of £1,089. Barnard, J., refused the first wife's application for a variation of the settlement in her favour.

Held : the main object of the variation of a settlement was to make proper provision for an injured spouse and the children of the marriage (if any), and prima facie settlements ought not to be interfered with further than was necessary for that purpose ; the first wife had failed to prove that it was necessary to vary the settlement in order to make proper provision for her ; in exercising his discretion BARNARD, J., had not taken into account any irrelevant factor or failed to take into account any material one, nor had he applied any erroneous principle of law ; and, therefore, his decision was right.

APPEAL by the wife against an order of BARNARD, J., dated Mar. 9, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 670, refusing to vary a settlement.

The applicant, the first wife of the deceased settlor, having obtained a decree absolute for the dissolution of her marriage, sought to vary an ante-nuptial settlement by an order directing the trustees to pay to her during her lifetime the income of the trust fund. The settlor, who had re-married, had exercised a power of appointment conferred on him by the settlement by directing in his will that the income should be paid in varying parts to his second wife and his sister and after the second wife's death to his sister's children. BARNARD, J., refused to accept a report of the registrar recommending a variation and his decision was now upheld by the Court of Appeal.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from an order of BARNARD, J., refusing to vary a pre-nuptial settlement made before the marriage of the late Mr. George Egerton and his wife, Sarah Egerton. The parties were married in April, 1928. The wife had divorced her first husband from whom she received a sum of £2,000 a year, but on marrying Mr. Egerton she had to give up about £1,000 a year of that and she was left with an income of approximately £1,100 a year. She is a Belgian by birth. There were no children of the marriage. The wife was 34 at the time of the marriage and the husband was also about that age. They lived together for under a year—in London, Kenya, Brussels, and then in London again, and in 1929 the wife left the husband and returned to Belgium. In Sept., 1931, the husband committed adultery with a woman in London over a period of some weeks, and then she passed out of his life. Notwithstanding the discretion statement signed by the husband which asserted that he had " informed my wife through her solicitors of my adultery soon after it took place, but she took no action in respect to it," Mr. Egerton, in his evidence, said that he had not informed his wife about the adultery. I do not know whether he had forgotten or was ill at the time when he gave his evidence, but the letters which the wife's solicitor wrote in Aug., 1946, when Mrs. Egerton offered to return to her husband, seem to me to indicate that he had not told her about the adultery because no reference is there made to it. It does not matter very much whether she knew about it or not.

From 1931 onwards the wife remained in Belgium and the husband remained in England. In 1947 the husband filed a petition for a divorce on the ground of desertion, asking the court, in view of his adultery in 1931, to exercise its discretion in his favour. The wife filed an answer denying desertion and not asking for any relief save that the petition should be dismissed. At the trial a copy of the discretion statement was furnished to the wife's solicitors, and the wife then asked to be allowed to amend her answer and allege the husband's adultery as stated in the discretion statement. The husband did not pursue his allegation of desertion and the wife was given a decree on the ground of the husband's adultery. In her evidence the wife said that when they went to Mombasa she paid her own expenses, that she had trouble with her husband because she did not want to give him any money, and that she paid the hotel bills. The husband would seem to have been more of a financial liability than an asset to his wife while they lived together. He had the income from a sum of approximately £18,000, acquired from his father, which he had brought into an ante-nuptial settlement dated Apr. 13, 1928, to which the wife was a party. Cl. 3 of that settlement provided :

> " After the death of the settlor if the said intended marriage shall at the date of his death be then subsisting and undissolved and if the wife shall be living at the expiration of seven days after the death of the settlor the trustees shall as and from the date of the death of the settlor subject as hereinafter mentioned pay the income of the trust fund (including the accruing interest aforesaid) to the wife during her life without power of anticipation during any coverture."

Clause 8 provided :

> " Subject to the provisions of cl. 3 hereof the settlor may from time to time by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint to or in favour of any other wife who may survive him during the residue of her life or any less period all or any part of the annual income of the trust fund."

The marriage having been dissolved, the interest of the wife under cl. 3 disappears, if the clause stands.

The wife's decree was made absolute on Aug. 15, 1947, and four days later the husband married his second wife, who is a young woman. On Sept. 14, 1947, he made a will in which he directed that the trustees were to hold the settled fund :

> " . . . upon trust as to one equal one fourth share both capital and income for [his second wife] absolutely and as to one other equal one fourth share thereof upon trust both capital and income for my sister absolutely and as to the remaining moiety of the said fund upon trust to pay the income arising therefrom to [his second wife] during her life with power for the trustees in their uncontrolled discretion to raise and pay out of the capital thereof any sum or sums not exceeding in the whole £5,000 to or for the benefit of [the said second wife] and subject thereto from and after her death upon trust for such of the children [of the said sister] as shall be living at the date of my death."

He also bequeathed the residue of his estate to his second wife absolutely.

On Oct. 15, the period for an application by the wife for a variation of the settlement expired because, by the rules, such an application must be made within two months from the decree absolute although the court has power to extend the time. On Nov. 17, the husband died, and on Jan. 27, 1948, the wife applied for leave to apply to vary the settlement. Leave was given by Pilcher, J., and the matter came before Mr. Registrar Pereira. He recommended a variation of the settlement in respect that during the lifetime of the first wife the trustees should pay to her instead of the sister one fourth of the income arising from the settled fund ; that, should the first wife survive the second wife, they should pay the income of a moiety of the said fund to the first wife for the remainder of her life instead of to the children of the sister ; and that the discretion of the trustees arising under the said appointment to raise and pay out of the capital of the said moiety sums not exceeding £5,000 to or for the benefit of the second wife should not be interfered with. In February, 1949, that report came before Barnard, J. Counsel for the wife asked that she should receive the income of the whole of the husband's fund during her life. Counsel for the other parties, including the sister and the children of the sister and the second wife, asked that the first wife should receive nothing. Barnard, J., decided that the settlement should not be varied. He gave as his reasons, first, the precise terms of the settlement, which it was sought to vary. As I understand his judgment, he meant that the wife, as a party to the settlement, was fully aware of the terms of cl. 3, which made it clear that, if her marriage had been dissolved at the instance of either party before the death of the husband, she had no interest whatsoever in the settlement. The wife, knowing the terms of cl. 3 and that she would lose her interest under the settlement if she took steps to dissolve the marriage, deliberately took those steps and the marriage was dissolved, and, therefore, it was argued, she could not complain if she were excluded from any interest in the fund. Barnard, J., referred to the fact that the wife did not apply to vary the settlement until after the two months had expired. I think there is substance in that point because the husband did not die until a month after the time had expired. If the wife within the two months had applied to vary, it may very well be that the husband would have made a different will from the will which he did make. He might have taken more effective steps to protect the interest of his second wife. In giving the reasons for his decision Barnard, J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 673) :

> " Giving due consideration to the terms of cl. 3 of the settlement, the lawfully acquired interests of the second wife, Lady Mary Cecilia Boyd [the husband's sister], and her children, the pecuniary means of the various parties, and the relative financial position of the husband and the wife during the subsistence of their marriage, I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to vary this settlement."

Counsel for the wife has argued that Barnard, J., disregarded some of the material facts in this case and did not properly apply the law. He has cited several cases and I must refer shortly to the material passages in them. In March v. March and Palumbo (1), Sir J. P. Wilde, J.O., said (L.R. 1 P. & D. 443) :

> " The relative sums contributed by each party, the conduct of each, the total amounts of their joint income, the relation it bears to the requirements of the parties, and their respective prospects of increased income, are all elements to be considered. These elements are not capable of exact expression in figures, and the result must be a general one, varying according to the details of each case."

I cannot see that Barnard, J., misapplied the law, as stated in that case, so far as it is a statement of the law. I need not refer to Hartopp v. Hartopp and Akhurst (2), because Barnard, J., cited the judgment of Gorell Barnes, J., in that case ([1949] 1 All E.R. 672).

In Prinsep v. Prinsep (3), Hill, J., made a statement which appears to have met with very considerable favour in later judgments of other judges. He said ([1929] P. 236) :

> " The main object of variation is to make proper provision for the injured spouse and the children of the marriage. And prima facie, settlements ought not to be interfered with further than is necessary for that purpose. But the court which has annulled the marriage must not only protect the injured party, but also be fair to the wrongdoing party."

That passage was cited with approval by Bateson, J., in Alston v. Alston (4), by Langton, J., in Colclough v. Colclough (5), and, I think, by Finnemore, J., in Burghley v. Burghley (6).

The main object of a variation is to make proper provision for the injured spouse and the children of the marriage. There are no children of this marriage. As to proper provision for the injured spouse, the first wife has been living on her own money ever since she married the husband. She never received anything from him financially while they lived together and she never got anything from him after they parted, and for eighteen years, apparently, she has been satisfied to live on the not inadequate income of some £1,100 a year. I cannot see that it is necessary to alter the terms of the settlement in order to make proper provision for her. The statement of Hill, J., that settlements ought not to be interfered with further than is necessary for that purpose raises the question : Is it necessary for the purpose of making proper provision to vary the settlement ?, and that question must be a matter for the discretion of the judge who hears the case. I agree that the discretion exercised by a judge in a case of this kind is not quite the same sort of discretion as that exercised in Blunt v. Blunt (7), but it is a matter for the discretion of the judge, and, unless one is satisfied that he went wrong in the law or misapprehended the facts, it is not right that this court should interfere with his decision. Taking the test which Hill, J., has laid down, I cannot see that the wife has made out that it is necessary to vary this settlement to make proper provision for her, and, that being so, in my judgment this appeal should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. In exercising his discretion in this case I cannot see that Barnard, J., took into account any irrelevant factor, or failed to take into account any material one, or that he has applied any erroneous principle of law. If the right factors are taken into account, the computation of their relative weight is a matter in which the judge can show great latitude. I do not see how we can disturb his assessment or its result in the present case, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. It is not lawful for an engaged couple to agree on what financial provisions should apply between them in the event of their separating after the marriage because it is against public policy that they should anticipate that they may separate, but, apparently, they are entitled to anticipate that they may be divorced, and a settlement which contains provisions as to what should happen in the case of divorce is not contrary to public policy. This seems to me to be anomalous and only to be tolerated because there is a safeguard against its abuse, namely, that after pronouncing a decree of divorce the court has an overriding power to vary any such settlement so as to do what is just. In the present case I see no abuse which needs to be corrected. The husband provided the fund for this settlement. If the wife had been the guilty party, there would have been nothing unjust in the deed, but she was the innocent party and had it in her option either to petition for judicial separation or for divorce. If she had proceeded for judicial separation, her rights under the deed would have remained intact. She chose to proceed for divorce. That enabled the husband to re-marry and he then became liable to maintain a second wife. The first wife has adequate means of her own, whereas the second wife has none. The first wife has lived on her own means for eighteen years and there is no reason why she should now get more at the expense of the second wife. The appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. No order as to costs except that trustees' costs out of the estate as between solicitor and client.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Tucker and Singleton, L.JJ.), June 16, 17, 29, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant—Breach—Damages—Measure—Covenant to reinstate premises at end of term—No actual damage suffered by landlord—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 19 (2).

By a lease dated Dec. 12, 1934, a landlord demised certain business premises to a tenant who covenanted, inter alia, not to make alterations to the premises without the consent and approval of the landlord and superior landlords. On Aug. 14, 1936, the tenant assigned the lease to a company who obtained a licence from the landlord to construct a new shop front in place of the existing one. In that licence the assignees covenanted that they would, if so required, at the expiration or sooner determination of the lease, reinstate the premises in their original condition. The assignees completed the alterations in February, 1940. In June, 1940, the premises were requisitioned by a government department which had remained in occupation ever since. In 1945 the lease was determined by agreement and in June, 1946, the landlord gave notice to the assignees requiring them to reinstate the premises. The assignees having failed to comply with the notice, the landlord brought proceedings against the tenant and the assignees claiming damages for breach of covenant to reinstate. There was no evidence that the landlord had any reason for desiring an alteration of the new shop front, or that the restoration of the old one was required for any particular purpose, or that the premises were in any way less valuable by reason of the alteration. On a question as to the measure of damages :

HELD by the Court of Appeal : (i) the rule as laid down in Joyner v. Weeks ([1891] 2 Q.B 31) as to the measure of damages for breach of a covenant to deliver up a house in repair was not appropriate to the present case ; the general rule as to damages for breach of contract ought to be applied ; and, as the landlord had suffered no damage by the failure to reinstate, he was entitled only to nominal damages.

Appeal by the tenant under and assignees of a lease against an order of an official referee, His Honour J. G. Trapnell, K.C., dated Jan. 26, 1949, whereby he awarded the landlord substantial damages for breach of a covenant to reinstate the demised premises at the expiration or sooner determination of the lease. The appeal was also concerned with two questions of breach of covenant to repair, with which this report does not deal. The Court of Appeal, in allowing the appeal, held that the landlord was only entitled to nominal damages. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by Lord Goddard, C.J.

Mitchison, K.C., and Morgan Blake for the landlord.

Ward, K.C., and Ryder Richardson for the tenant and assignees.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. By a lease dated Dec. 12, 1934, the landlord demised to the tenant certain premises known as the James Store in Carrington St., Nottingham, for a term of 21 years at a rent of £1,250 for the first seven years and £1,500 thereafter. The lease contained a full repairing covenant and also a covenant that the tenant would not during the said term make or permit to be made any substantial addition, deviation, or alteration, to or in the demised premises without the consent and approval of the landlord and her superior landlords, and would submit plans, elevations, and so forth, of any proposed addition or alteration for approval by her and the superior landlords. On Dec. 13, 1934, the landlord granted to the tenant a licence for the alteration of the existing shop front and the erection of one which differed very materially from that which was in existence at the time of the demise. That licence contained a provision that at the expiration or sooner determination of the lease the tenant would reimburse to the landlord the cost of the reinstatement and making good by the landlord of the demised permises, including the cost of removing the additions and alterations made by virtue of the licence, as if the several works and alterations authorised had not been made, provided that the liability of the tenant should not be greater than the cost of the reinstatement actually carried out by the landlord. The tenant, in fact, did not carry out any work under the licence, and on May 29, 1936, the lease was assigned by him to the assignees. On Aug. 14, 1936, by a deed which was said to be supplemental to the licence to which we have just referred ("the principal licence"), the landlord granted a licence to the assignees to execute certain alterations and works which were of the same description as those contemplated by the tenant, namely, the erection of a new shop front, and the licence contained a covenant by the assignees at the expiration or sooner determination of the lease, if so required, to restore the said premises to the same state as they were in before the said alterations and works had been executed by the assignees, or, at the option of the landlord, to the same state as they were in before the principal licence was granted and as if the several works and alterations thereby or by the principal licence authorised had not been made. It was also provided that the second licence should be in addition to, but not in substitution for, the principal licence, the covenants and conditions of which should remain in full force and effect. It is, however, only necessary to consider the provision for restoration contained in the second licence.

It is apparent that the obligations on the assignees imposed by the second licence are different from those contained in the first licence, and it was not argued that for this purpose the two licences would have to be read together. The works were carried out by the assignees at a cost of something like £3,300, they being finished in February, 1940. On May 27, 1940, notice was given by the assignees to determine the lease on Mar. 25, 1941, but on June 20, 1940, the premises were requisitioned by the War Department and have ever since remained in the occupation of one government department or another. In March, 1941, the landlord started proceedings, claiming damages for breach of the repairing covenant in the lease and for a declaration that the lease could not be determined by the assignees because they had not put the said premises into a proper state of repair. That action was settled on terms, one of which was that the lease should continue in existence until Sept, 29, 1945. At that date, as we have already said, a government department was still in occupation and paying compensation at the rate of £1,100 a year. While we were informed that negotiations had for some time been in progress with regard to a lease being granted to the ministry, so far no agreement has been concluded. On June 12, 1946, notice was given on behalf of the landlord to the assignees that she required them, in exercise of the option contained in the second licence, to restore the premises to the same state as they were in before the principal licence was granted and as if the works and alterations authorised by both licences had not been made. There was no suggestion that she had been required by her superior landlords to reinstate the premises.

On Oct. 15, 1947, the writ in this action was issued claiming damages for breach of the repairing covenants and for breach of the covenant to restore the premises to their former condition. The action was referred to an official referee and was heard by His Honour J. G. TRAPNELL, K.C. The principal matter in dispute, at any rate so far as this appeal is concerned, is as to the true measure of damages which the landlord can recover for the failure of the tenants and assignees to restore the premises to their original condition. The learned referee, apparently applying the rule which prevails, or did prevail before the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, as to the measure of damages recoverable for breach of a repairing covenant, has awarded the landlord a sum of money, some £4,300, which he estimates is the probable cost of doing the work of restoration. It is quite obvious from his judgment, and, indeed, it could not seriously be disputed considering that the government department is still in occupation of the premises, that, in his opinion, the landlord will not herself restore these premises and there is not the slightest likelihood of the shop front ever being replaced. In other words, it will simply enable the landlord to put this sum of money in her pocket, but he came to the conclusion that there were no provisions in the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, applying to this case, and that, therefore, the landlord was entitled to recover the damages at common law. If she is, no doubt it is no concern of the court what she will do with the money when she gets it, and the first question we have to consider is whether the measure of damages is the cost of doing the work, assuming it can be done.

Counsel for the tenant and assignees did not argue that the fact that a government department were in occupation at the present time would afford any defence, considering, no doubt rightly, that he was precluded from setting up that contention by the decision of the House of Lords in Matthey v. Curling (1). Although the matter is not quite clear, we think the learned referee has fixed the sum as the price at which the work could be done today with some deduction because of the fact that the work cannot in any case be carried out for a very considerable time.

Now, we think the case has to be considered without regard to the fact that a Ministry is at present in possession of the premises. If we eliminate that fact the position would be, so far as the shop front is concerned, that the landlord would receive back her premises from the tenant and assignees with a new and modern shop front. Although evidence was, no doubt, given that some persons might prefer the old shop front as it was, no evidence was given either by or on behalf of the landlord that she had any reason whatever for desiring an alteration of the present shop front or that restoration of the old one would make the premises more suitable for any particular purpose or business which she might wish to carry on there or that the premises were in any way adversely affected or made less valuable by reason of the alteration to the shop front. True there was some evidence that there had been a reduction in the rateable value, but it cannot be taken that this was due to the alterations which had been carried out. What, then, is the measure of damages applicable to the breach of a covenant to restore on request when the only evidence is that there has been no compliance with that request ? In our opinion, the general rule as to damages for breach of contract ought to be applied, namely, to ascertain what the damage actually suffered amounts to. A covenant is only a special form of contract and the same rules apply to a breach of covenant as apply to a breach of a simple contract so far as damages are concerned.

To apply to this case the rule as to the measure of damages for a breach of contract to deliver up a house in repair is, in our opinion, wrong, for there is no true analogy between the two cases. If a tenant fails to deliver up a house in repair, the landlord must suffer some damage at least so long as the house remains in existence. Instead of getting a house in a perfect state of repair he gets one which is dilapidated. It is true that he may be able to let the dilapidated house for the same or even a higher rent than he was hitherto getting, but that may be due to market conditions and more especially to the demand for a certain class of premises. A dilapidated house must be worth less than a house in a proper state of repair. Presumably, if the house is sold in good repair, it would fetch more than a house which is out of repair. If a house can be let in good repair, it would ordinarily fetch a higher rent than one that is out of repair. Damage is, therefore, suffered. The measure of damages to be applied was laid down in Joyner v. Weeks (2). In that case the Divisional Court had applied the same rule as is applicable to a case where the lessee has failed to keep the house in repair during the term and ordered the damages to be assessed according to the injury done to the reversion. The Court of Appeal held that in these cases there was a well-defined rule which had become a rule of law that, on a failure to deliver up a house in good repair, the damage was the cost of the work necessary to put it into repair. LORD ESHER, M.R., in giving the judgment referred ([1891] 2 Q.B. 43) to the large number of cases in which this rule had been adopted, and said that such an inveterate practice amounted to a rule of law. He said it was a highly convenient rule, avoiding all the subtle refinements with which the court had been indulged and the extensive and costly inquiries which they would involve. It was a simple and business-like rule, and he was very much inclined to think it was an absolute rule. But, as we have already said, that case must be regarded as proceeding on the footing that the landlord must have suffered damage by the tenant yielding up the house out of repair. We see no ground here for assuming that the landlord in the present case has suffered any damage at all. She has got back a shop, or would have done so if the premises had not been requisitioned, provided with a modern and convenient front, and there was no suggestion that the work had not been carried out properly. We do not for one moment suggest that it might not be possible for a landlord, in circumstances such as these to give evidence that she or her superior landlords at the end of the term desired to carry on or to let the premises for the purpose of carrying on a business for which the altered shop front would be inappropriate and the old one suitable. In that case she might well say that it is of value to her to have her shop back in its former condition and she would suffer damage if the tenant's or assignees' covenant to restore was not carried out, but if it is a mere matter of getting back a shop which has been altered and there is no suggestion that any damage whatever has been caused to the landlord thereby, it appears to us she has suffered no damage by reason of the tenant's or assignees' failure to comply with her requirements to reinstate. The official referee evidently thought that not only did the landlord not intend to do this work, but it would be a sheer waste of money if the work were done, and, as no evidence was given that the landlord has suffered any damage in fact, the court is not entitled, in our opinion, to come to the conclusion that she must have suffered damage by reason of the tenant or assignees not complying with her requirements. In our opinion, therefore, she cannot be entitled to any more than nominal damages, which we should assess at twenty shillings, by reason of the alleged breach of covenant.

The learned official referee thought that there was no provision in the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, applicable to this case. On the view that we take of the common law rights of the parties, it is really unnecessary to consider the provisions of that Act, though we confess we have some difficulty in seeing why the provisions of s. 19 (2) do not apply to this case. By that section a covenant against making the alteration, for we think the word " improvement " in the section means an improvement from the tenant's point of view, is to be subject to a proviso that consent is not to be unreasonably withheld, and, in fact, it was given. The section enacts that the proviso to this effect does not preclude the right of the landlord to require, as a condition of his consent in the case of an improvement which does not add to the letting value of the holding, a reasonable requirement that the tenant should reinstate the premises into the condition they were before the improvement was executed. It is true there was no evidence here whether the improvement did or did not add to the letting value of the holding. If it did, the section would prevent the landlord requiring the tenant to reinstate and, in any case, such a requirement would have to be reasonable. For our part, we cannot see that in this case it would be a reasonable requirement. At any rate, there was no evidence to show that it was reasonable. The most that was said was that some people might prefer the old front to the new, but it is, perhaps, unnecessary to give a final decision on the application of s. 19 (2) for the reasons which we have already stated.

The appeal, in our opinion, succeeds and the tenant and assignees should have the costs.

Appeal allowed with costs.

JOHNSON v. JOHNSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), June 30, 1949.]

Variation of Settlement—Application to vary made out of time—Consideration of facts as known at date of hearing of application—Separation deed—Covenant by husband to pay wife weekly sum during her life—Marriage dissolved—Re-marriage of both parties—Insertion in deed of dum sola clause—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 192.

The parties were married on Apr. 20, 1935. On May 14, 1943, they entered into a separation deed under which the husband covenanted to pay his wife for her support and maintenance the sum of £1 10*s.* a week during her life. In 1946 the wife obtained a decree absolute of divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, and subsequently both she and the husband re-married, there being a child by each of these second marriages. In 1949 the husband obtained leave to apply for variation of the deed under s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, notwithstanding the expiry of more than two months after decree absolute, the time limited for such an application by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 44. ORMEROD, J., varied the deed by inserting in it a dum sola clause so as to disentitle the wife to the payments while she was married. On appeal, HELD : the court was bound to consider the application in the light of the facts as they were known at the date when it was heard ; the fact that both parties had re-married must, therefore, be taken into account; and in those circumstances there was no reason to interfere with the judge's exercise of his discretion.

[AS TO VARIATION OF SETTLEMENTS AFTER DISSOLUTION OF MARRIAGE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 800-809, paras. 1274-1292; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 517-533, Nos. 5576-5778.]

Case referred to:

(1) Tomkins v. Tomkins, [1948] 1 All E.R. 237; [1948] P. 170; [1948] L.J.R. 1028.

APPEAL by the wife from an order of ORMEROD, J., dated Mar. 28, 1949, whereby he varied a deed of separation providing for weekly payments by the husband to the wife during her life by inserting a dum sola clause.

The wife, having obtained a decree of divorce from the husband, had re-married. Three years later the husband obtained leave to apply out of time to vary the deed. The wife contended that the application should be dealt with as if the husband had applied within two months of the decree absolute, the time prescribed for such an application by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 44, and that regard should not be had to what had happened subsequently. The Court of Appeal overruled this contention and dismissed the appeal.

W. Phillips for the wife.

P. A. Harmsworth for the husband.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J.: The parties were married on Apr. 20, 1935. On May 14, 1943, a separation deed was made between them which recited that against the wishes of the wife the husband had ceased to live with her and that he had agreed to make provision for her maintenance. The provision was that the husband would pay to the wife for her support and maintenance during her life £1 10*s.* 0*d.* per week. Later, the husband served in the army and the wife received her allowance from the military authorities. In due course she obtained a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, the decree being made absolute on Feb. 25, 1946. Thereafter the husband did not make any payments under the separation deed, and he did not apply to vary the deed within the two months after decree absolute as prescribed by the rules. In June, 1946, the wife re-married and had a child. Later, the husband also re-married and he had a child by this second marriage. So both the parties have now set up new establishments. In 1948 the wife brought an action in the King's Bench Division claiming arrears of maintenance under the deed from the time of the divorce in February, 1946, down to the time when she sued. The master gave judgment for the arrears up to the time of the wife's re-marriage in June, 1946, but stood over the claim for maintenance from that date onwards pending an application in the Divorce Division for variation of the separation deed. The husband then applied in the Divorce Division for leave to apply out of time to vary the deed. He was given leave and then made his substantive application. It has been heard by the registrar and the judge. Both have held that the wife's maintenance should cease as from the date of her re-marriage. She now appeals to this court, claiming that the deed should not be varied and that she should still be paid the maintenance due under it.

It is plain that this separation deed was a post-nuptial settlement which the court has power to vary under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192. Settlements of this kind are always subject to variation by order of the court in the event of the marriage being dissolved: see Tomkins v. Tomkins (1). When this separation deed was made in 1943 the parties probably never applied their minds to what should happen in the case of a divorce. All they had in mind was that the £1 10*s.* 0*d.* a week should be paid during the separation, but the deed says that the maintenance is to be paid to the wife " during her life." As a matter of literal construction, therefore, it applies even after the parties are divorced. This is where the remedial powers of the Divorce Court come into play. The divorce alters the position fundamentally and the court is enabled to vary the deed so as to do what is just between the parties. Counsel argued, on behalf of the wife, that she ought to have the £1 10*s.* 0*d.* maintenance notwithstanding her re-marriage and the husband's re-marriage. The first point he made was that this ought to be dealt with as if the husband had applied within two months of the decree absolute, at which time neither the wife nor the husband had re-married, and that the court ought to shut their eyes to what happened subsequently. In my opinion, that argument will not bear examination for one moment. When the court gives leave for an application to be made after the two months, the application must be considered on its merits in the circumstances which exist when it comes on for hearing. The powers of the court under s. 192 of the Act of 1925 are unrestricted by any procedural rules about time. To take a parallel, when a court assesses damages long after an accident, it has regard to the facts that have happened between the date of the writ and the date of the assessment. The contingencies which have become actualities are to be taken into account as actualities. So, here, whenever a court comes to deal with an application under s. 192, it deals with it on the facts as known at the time when the application is heard, and not on hypothetical contingencies as they existed within two months of the decree absolute. Approaching the matter in that way, the facts here are that the husband has re-married, he has a wife and a child, and he has given full details of his income in an affidavit. The wife has re-married and has a child, but she has not put before the court any details of her income, and it is a reasonable inference that she is supported by her second husband.

Counsel for the wife says that she is the innocent party and, as such, has a special claim for consideration. I agree that the innocence of a party is certainly a matter for consideration, but so are many other matters. The most material factor in this case is that the wife has re-married and has a husband to support her. As LORD GREENE, M.R., pointed out in Tomkins v. Tomkins (1) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 241), it is a relevant consideration that, if the settlement is allowed to stand as it is, the money paid under it will or may go into the ordinary household expenses of the new establishment. So in this case the money might well go to help the new husband in the new establishment. It was for this reason that the registrar thought that the deed should be varied by striking out the provision for the payment of the £1 10*s.* 0*d.* a week. The judge varied it by inserting a dum sola clause, which means that the £1 10*s.* 0*d.* is to be paid to the wife while she is unmarried, but not to be paid to her when she has re-married and has a new husband to support her. It seems to me that there is ample ground for the judge exercising his discretion in the way he did, and there is no ground for saying that he has erred in point of principle, or taken into account matters which he ought not to have taken into account, or omitted matters which he ought to have considered. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

In a probate action the two attesting witnesses gave evidence that they had subscribed their names to the will before the testator appended her signature, in which case the will would not be validly attested. The propounders of the will tendered evidence to show that the evidence given by the attesting witnesses was erroneous, but the plaintiff contended that the evidence of the attesting witnesses was conclusive.

Held : the object of the legislature in imposing the strict formalities required by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9, was the prevention of fraud, and the duty of the court was to see that no fraud was perpetrated ; the exclusion of further evidence could only increase the possibility of the perpetration of fraud ; and, therefore, it was competent for the propounders of the will to call further evidence.

Probate Action.

Evidence adverse to the due execution of the will having been given by the attesting witnesses, the question was whether it was competent for the court to receive evidence to rebut that of the attesting witnesses. Willmer, J., ruled that it was. The case is only reported on this point.

Fairweather for the plaintiff.

Winn for the defendants (propounders of the will).

WILLMER, J. : I am asked to rule that, having heard the evidence of the two attesting witnesses to this will, it is not competent for me to receive the evidence of any other witnesses with regard to the attestation of the will. The two attesting witnesses have both said that they subscribed their names to the will before the testator appended her signature. If that was the true state of facts, it is clear that this will was not attested in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9, and it is not competent for me to admit it to probate. Counsel for the propounders of the will, however, has indicated to me that other evidence is available to show that the attesting witnesses are in error in saying what they have said in their evidence. The question is whether it is competent for me to receive that evidence. It is submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the evidence given by the attesting witnesses is conclusive. He bases his submission largely on the fact that no presumption arises in this case because of the peculiar wording of the attestation clause, which is :

> " Signed by the said Nellie May Vere-Wardale in our joint presence and by us in her presence and the presence of each other."

There is not a wealth of authority on the subject. I have been referred to Mortimer on Probate Law and Practice, 2nd ed., p. 127, and have had the opportunity of considering Young v. Richards (1) and Burgoyne v. Showler (2), the two cases there cited, but I think it is clear that neither of those cases goes quite so far as the proposition stated in MORTIMER, which is as follows :

> "Even if the witnesses profess to remember the transaction and state that the will was not duly executed (that the testator did not make or acknowledge his signature in their joint presence, or so forth), this negative evidence may not only be rebutted by the evidence of other witnesses, but the court may in this case also, from a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and of the facts and circumstances which the attesting witnesses themselves state, come to the conclusion either that they are not to be credited or that their recollection fails them ; and so the will may be admitted to probate in spite of their testimony."

On the other hand, I am bound to regard MORTIMER ON PROBATE LAW AND PRACTICE as a very authoritative contribution to the law of England. I was also referred to the judgment of LORD PENZANCE (L.R. 1 P. & D. 682) in Wright v. Rogers (3), where he seemed to make it clear, first, that the presumption of law in favour of due execution exists, notwithstanding the wording of the attestation clause. LORD PENZANCE then said (as I understand his words) that the presumption was enormously strengthened if there was a perfect attestation clause, and he continued (ibid.) :

> "Where both the witnesses, however, swear that the will was not duly executed, and there is no evidence the other way, there is no footing for the court to affirm that the will was duly executed."

The important words, to my mind, in that context are "and there is no evidence the other way." If it were not competent to call other evidence in addition to that of the attesting witnesses, those words would have been otiose, and I cannot imagine LORD PENZANCE including them in his judgment unless his view was that it was competent on this question to call witnesses to contradict the attesting witnesses. It seems to me that, although Wright v. Rogers (3) is not cited in support of the proposition in MORTIMER ON PROBATE LAW AND PRACTICE, 2nd ed., p. 127, which I have read, it certainly lends some support to the broad proposition there stated.

A word about the attestation clause. I have always understood that no particular form of words is required for the attestation clause—indeed, the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9, says so. Counsel for the plaintiff has attacked the attestation clause in this case which, he claims, is in an unusual form. It appears, however, to be similar to that which is used in some of the cases to which I have been referred and in accordance with the common precedent in KEY AND ELPHINSTONE'S PRECEDENTS IN CONVEYANCING, 14th ed., vol. 2, p. 953. I do not think that I can draw any inference from the peculiar wording of the attestation clause.

It appears to me that the object of the legislature in imposing the strict formalities required by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9, was the prevention of fraud, and, therefore, that my duty here is to do all that I can to see that no fraud is perpetrated, and, if I am to exclude further evidence, it seems to me that such a ruling can only increase the possibility of the perpetration of fraud. In all the circumstances it appears to me that it would be wrong and not in accordance with authority to exclude such further evidence with regard to the attestation of this will as may be available. I, therefore, decline to rule that it is not competent for the propounders of this will to adduce further evidence, and they are at liberty to do so.

I.*

By a mortgage, dated Dec. 5, 1946, the mortgagor charged a dwelling-house, the rateable value of which fell within the monetary limits prescribed by the Rent Restrictions Acts, with the payment by weekly instalments of the sum secured and interest thereon. The mortgage contained inter alia a clause expressly excluding the mortgagor's power of leasing under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), and the mortagees were empowered to enter into possession of the property on default of payment of a certain number of weekly instalments. In January, 1947, F.G. occupied the house under a tenancy agreement with the mortgagor. The weekly instalments due under the mortgage having fallen into arrears, the mortgagees claimed possession of the property, but the claim was resisted by F.G. on the ground that he was the lawful tenant of the house and entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

Held : (i) the protection against eviction conferred on a tenant by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), read with sched. I to the Act, applied only against a landlord or a person who could be described as in the position of a landlord, and the definition of " landlord " in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), was not in itself sufficient to enable a mortgagee to be described as a " landlord " for the purpose of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

(ii) as the mortgagor's power of leasing under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), was expressly excluded by the terms of the mortgage deed of Dec. 5, 1946, and the mortgagees had never accepted F.G.'s tenancy as binding on them, there was no contractual relationship between F.G. and the mortgagees, either imported by the Rent Restrictions Acts or otherwise, and, therefore, notwithstanding that the tenancy was lawful, and binding as between F.G. and the mortgagor, F.G. could not claim the protection of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933 against the mortgagees, who were asserting their paramount title, and the mortgagees were entitled to possession of the property.

APPEAL by the mortgagees from a decision of VAISEY, J., dated Mar. 8, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 691, dismissing a summons taken out by the
B mortgagees, under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, asking for delivery of possession of the property, a dwelling-house, subject to the mortgage.

The mortgagor, the first defendant, in the action, did not enter an appearance, but the second defendant, who was in occupation of the house under a tenancy agreement granted to him by the mortgagor, claimed the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1).
C VAISEY, J., held that, although the lease granted by the mortgagor to the second defendant was not, on the facts of the case, binding on the mortgagees, the second defendant's tenancy was lawful and he was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The Court of Appeal now held that the protection against eviction given by s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933 applied only where possession was claimed by the landlord or a person in the position of a landlord and, as the D lease granted to the second defendant was not binding on the mortgagees, the second defendant could not assert his rights under s. 3 (1) against the mortgagees claiming by paramount title, and they allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Milner Holland, K.C., Stephen Murray, J. W. Mills and L. A. Blundell for
E the mortgagees.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and E. Dennis Smith for the second defendant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : Although the case now before us does not involve the same point as Alliance Building Society v. Varma (1), it also is an action started by originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, by mortgagees against two persons, the mortgagor and an individual
F in possession. There is this difference between the present case and the Alliance case (1)—that the man in possession, Fred Goodlad, does derive title from the mortgagor in the sense that his interest, which he claims to be that of a tenant, was created later than the mortgage, and he is, therefore, a person who could, as is conceded, exercise the right in the mortgagor to redeem the mortgage.

The matter is by no means free from serious difficulty, and it is surprising
G that there has been no similar case before the court since the rent restriction legislation first operated. The point, put in its briefest form, is this : Can a person in occupation of premises within the monetary limits prescribed by the Rent Restrictions Acts by virtue of a contract of tenancy between himself and a mortgagor claim the protection of those Acts against a mortgagee claiming to assert his rights as mortgagee, where, by the terms of the mortgage, the Law
H of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), has been expressly excluded ? The learned judge, VAISEY, J., came to the conclusion that such a tenant could claim protection, and it is with natural diffidence that I find I have reached a different conclusion. I will try to state the reasons for my differing from the learned judge, but it may be that this is a case in which there is a lacuna in the legislation. Whether Parliament did or did not intend to protect the tenants of mortgagors against eviction by title paramount is a matter on which I can express no opinion, but, if the view which I am about to express is right, Parliament, if it intended to protect such a tenant, has not been successful in achieving its intention.

The property is at Walsall, and the mortgage was made in December, 1946. The mortgagor does not seem to have been very satisfactory, for when the proceedings were started in November, 1948, no less than 91 weekly instalments were in arrear. The amount of each of those weekly instalments was £1 14*s.*, and it may be some reason for their being in arrear that in January, 1947, the mortgagor had granted a tenancy to Fred Goodlad, the second defendant, at a rent of only 16*s.* 6*d.* per week. The mortgage is a building society mortgage in the usual form providing for repayment by instalments. It is provided, and this is a matter on which counsel for the second defendant relied, that the mortgagees may do a number of things, as e.g., entering into possession or receipt of the rents and profits, but subject to a proviso. The proviso (to cl. 4) is :

> " . . . that the society shall not exercise the powers of entering into possession letting or selling hereinbefore contained unless and until the mortgagor shall have made default for three lunar months in payment of some such instalment . . ."

There is no question whatever that the three lunar months' period had elapsed, but the purpose for which counsel for the second defendant relies on the proviso will appear later. Clause 7 of the deed provides that the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), shall not apply. It is, first, necessary to state the effect of excluding that sub-section, the terms of which are familiar. They are :

> " A mortgagor of land while in possession shall, as against every incumbrancer, have power to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged land, or any part thereof, as is by this section authorised."

Various conditions, to which I need not refer, are imposed on the mortgagor's right to grant leases which will be effective and binding on persons entitled as mortgagees or through the mortgagees. Section 99 (13) provides that the mortgage deed may by express terms exclude the privilege which s. 99 (1) otherwise confers on the mortgagor, and, as I have stated, that privilege was excluded in this case.

What, therefore, is the effect, first, in general, and, secondly—and this is the main point—for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts, of a demise of the mortgaged property made by a mortgagor who, according to the terms of the mortgage, has no power to make a lease which will bind the mortgagee ? One of the cases cited before us, and referred to in the judgment of VAISEY, J., is Iron Trades Employers Insurance Assocn., Ltd. v. Union Land and House Investors, Ltd. (2), a decision of FARWELL, J. That was a different case from the present in that the statutory power to grant leases was not excluded, but there was a covenant by the mortgagor that it would not be exercised save on a condition. In effect, as the learned judge held, the parties had added to the statutory conditions of s. 99 of the Act of 1925 a fresh contractual condition In considering the case before him, FARWELL, J., used, among others, the following phrase in a part of his judgment devoted to a somewhat similar point to that which I am now considering, viz., the effect of demises by mortgagors who are restricted in their powers to grant leases. The learned judge said ([1937] 1 All E.R. 484):

> " Any lease he might attempt to grant to some third party would be in no way binding on the mortgagee, and as between the lessee and the mortgagee would create no estate or interest other than that which I will mention in a moment."

The interest which was mentioned later was the right which the lessee had as a person interested in the equity of redemption to redeem the mortgage.

Counsel for the second defendant was disposed to criticise somewhat the broad language I have cited, and he referred us to a number of other cases designed to show that, apart from the statutory power under s. 99 of the Act of 1925, a mortgagor has the power to create a lawful right to possession on the part of the tenant or to create in the tenant some title or interest which (as counsel for the second defendant put it) will be effective until, or unless, it is destroyed by the mortgagee. In other words, it is said that the mortgagor can create a defeasible interest by demise. Without disrespect to the argument of counsel for the second defendant I shall not refer to all the cases which were cited. I am content to take the language of the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in Corbett v. Plowden (3), where he said (25 Ch.D. 681):

> "If a mortgagor left in possession grants a lease without the concurrence of the mortgagees (and for this purpose it makes no difference whether it is an equitable lease by an agreement under which possession is taken, or a legal lease by actual demise) the lessee has a precarious title, inasmuch as, although the lease is good as between himself and the mortgagor who granted it, the paramount title of the mortgagees may be asserted against both of them."

I am content, for the purpose of the question which we have to consider, to take as the correct relevant statement the passage from LORD SELBORNE'S judgment which I have just read, and to assume, therefore, to borrow his language, that the second defendant, the tenant in this case, has a precarious title, good as between himself and the mortgagor, but liable to be defeated on the assertion by the mortgagees of their paramount title. Until that happens, the second defendant can remain lawfully in possession. It is plain that in the present proceedings the mortgagees are asserting their paramount title. Their argument is that there is here no contract which affects them in any way, they are not parties to the tenancy, and the power which the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), would have given to the mortgagor to make a contract binding on them has been expressly and properly excluded. Put in another way, say the mortgagees, the mortgagor here had not such an estate in himself that he could confer on the second defendant, his tenant, an interest or estate in the land which is effective against our paramount title. Therefore, we are wholly unaffected by this transaction of demise, and prima facie, therefore, we are entitled, asserting our title paramount, to evict the second defendant and claim possession.

Apart from the Rent Restrictions Acts, there could be no defence to that argument. It is said, however, that the Rent Restrictions Acts are designed to protect from eviction occupants of premises within the ambit of those Acts, and that the effect of the Acts is to compel the court to hold that, although the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), has been expressly excluded, this lease binds the mortgagees. The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2), provides:

> "This Act shall apply to a house . . . let as a separate dwelling . . ."

It is said that this house was let by the mortgagor to the second defendant as a separate dwelling. There was nothing unlawful in the letting, nor was it entirely nugatory, because, on the basis of the language in Corbett v. Plowden (3), it did operate to confer on the second defendant such a right as LORD SELBORNE describes. But that is not the end of the matter. In considering to what class of cases the Rent Restrictions Acts are intended to apply, for what purposes, and between what persons, it is, I think, useful next to look at the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (1), for, if the second defendant is entitled to succeed, it must be by virtue of reliance on that sub-section. Section 3 (1) provides:

> "No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-> house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejectment of a tenant therefrom shall be made or given unless . . ."

Then reference is made to the various circumstances in which the court can make an order. Counsel for the second defendant points out that there is no reference in that sub-section, or in the main body of the Act, to the landlord, or to any particular person as the person claiming the order. It is, he says, quite general in its terms. But when the terms of sched. I to the Act of 1933 A are examined, I think it is plain that what s. 3 (1) and sched. I, which is read into it, must be taken to contemplate is a proceeding for possession against the tenant by someone who may be fairly described—and I deliberately use that phrase for the moment—as a landlord. In other words, it appears to me that the general conception—which I, of course, entirely accept—that the Acts are designed to protect occupants of dwelling-houses within the Acts against B eviction must be qualified to the extent that the protection afforded is against eviction at the suit of persons who may fairly and properly be described as landlords of the occupants. I will not go in detail through the terms of sched. I to the Act of 1933, but they contain several references to the "landlord" and the "tenant." To take one example, they include (in para. (a)), breach by the tenant of obligations due under a contract of tenancy, or its C equivalent, and failure to pay any rent due. It seems to me, therefore, that, looking at s. 3 (1) and sched. I to the Act of 1933, and reading them with s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933 contemplates that the person against whom the occupant is to be protected is someone who can be described as his landlord. Pausing for a moment at that stage, and turning to the facts of this case, it will at once be seen that the description cannot be fairly, as I D think, applied to the mortgagees in their claim against the second defendant. The mortgagees are not his landlords, and never have been. The evidence makes it, I think, tolerably clear that the mortgagees have never accepted the second defendant's tenancy as one which binds them, and it is clear that there is no contractual relationship between the second defendant and the mortgagees, either imported by the Rent Restrictions Acts or otherwise. E

Counsel for the second defendant, however, very properly draws attention to the definition of "landlord" in the definition section, s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1920. In s. 12 (1) (f) it is stated :

> "The expression 'landlord' . . . include[s] any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord . . ."

F

Section 12 (1) (g) states :

> "The expression 'landlord' also includes in relation to any dwelling-house any person, other than the tenant, who is or would but for this Act be entitled to possession of the dwelling-house . . ."

Counsel for the second defendant says that those are wide terms, and the mortgagees should be regarded as being within the ambit of the definition, since G they are, in truth, persons "who are or would but for this Act be entitled to possession of the dwelling-house." It seems to me, however, that some limitation must be put on the scope of those words. To take the most extreme case, they could not be applied where the occupant was a squatter having no right or title, or alleging that he was the tenant of someone else who equally had no right or title. The argument is, indeed, a circular one, for, if the claimant H to possession of property is to be regarded as a "landlord" for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts, then it must first have been decided that the occupant is protected by the Acts. When the definition in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 is read together with s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933, and sched. I to that Act, it is obvious that the gravest difficulties are going to be encountered if so wide a meaning is to be given to this phrase as counsel for the second defendant suggests. Without attempting any precise statement or definition of what is itself a definition I think that the explanation may be found in this. Section 12 (1) (g) extends the definition of "landlord" to persons deriving title under a landlord. In certain circumstances, to which I must presently refer, a sub-tenant is entitled to the protection of the Acts. Where a head lessor is suing for possession against a tenant, the Act of 1920 makes provision, by s. 5 (5) [as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 4], and s. 15 (3), for preserving the sub-tenant's right to possession as against the landlord, and the sub-tenant becomes, or may become, the statutory tenant of the head landlord. In such a case as that, in construing the various provisions of the Acts, the landlord, quoad the sub-tenant, is a person not deriving title under that sub-tenant's landlord, but is a person whose title is superior to that sub-tenant's landlord. Furthermore, in certain circumstances (when, for example, an effective notice to quit has been given) the contractual tenancy between A and B may come to an end, and there then is created what is known as a statutory tenancy, B remaining in possession as a "statutory tenant" of A. It has been said in these courts that a statutory tenancy, as the phrase is commonly used, is a somewhat inapposite expression, for it confers on the so-called statutory tenant no estate or interest in the land. He cannot part with it or dispose of it, and in certain circumstances the right to possession, which is its principal feature, may pass to persons who would be quite different from the persons who would get the benefit of a contractual tenancy when a tenant dies. It would appear, therefore, more than possible that this addition by s. 12 (1) (g) to the definition of "landlord" was put in (and, I think, something would have had to be put in) to make the word "landlord," where a statutory tenancy has been created, apply in the relationship being then dealt with by the Acts between the person who would be entitled to possession apart from the Acts and the statutory tenant. I, therefore, have come to the conclusion that this definition is not sufficient to give to the mortgagees in this case the right to describe themselves as the "landlords" for the purposes of these Acts.

I am, therefore, thrown back on the result which I derive from my consideration of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, and s. 3 (1) and sched. I to the Act of 1933. That result is to the effect that the mortgagees, asserting their title paramount, can properly resist the claim of the tenant to protection under s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933 by denying, as they can deny, any contractual right which binds them, or any estate or interest in the land on the part of the tenant which affects the mortgagees' title. The question has been debated whether the result would be the same if the mortgagor had determined the contractual tenancy, which he, undoubtedly, created between himself and the second defendant, so that, at any rate as between himself and the second defendant, a statutory tenancy had arisen. I prefer for my part to express no view whether the result would be different if the second defendant could say: "My right to remain here is not by virtue of any contract or any estate which I derive from the mortgagor, but is by virtue of the statutory right to possession which, as between me and the mortgagor, the Rent Acts have conferred." Counsel for the second defendant suggested that in that event the mortgagees could not succeed in ousting the second defendant, but I must not be taken to assent to that. As I have said, I find it unnecessary to decide it. It may be that there is an anomaly, but I am certainly not satisfied that, if there had been a statutory tenancy created in the way I have indicated, that would have been necessarily sufficient to defeat the mortgagees' rights.

I have, I hope, covered the main part of the argument, but there is one other matter which I think is instructive, to which I have made some reference, and it is this. In s. 5 (5), as amended, and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 special provision is made to protect a sub-tenant. I think that fact supports the view pressed on us by the mortgagees, for, if it were true to say that the existence of a tenancy lawfully created or of a tenancy created in fact, binds, so to speak, the whole world, then, though, no doubt, some provision might have to be inserted, I do not think that the provisions of s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) would have taken the form they have. It seems to me that those sub-sections are directed to providing in clear terms that, although, were it not for their provisions, the title paramount of the superior landlord would prevail, yet Parliament is intending that that title should not prevail, and that the sub-tenant's right to possession should be preserved, and, therefore, the legislation goes on expressly to provide that thereafter there shall be deemed to come into existence a contractual relationship, or the equivalent of a contractual relationship, which is carefully defined, between the sub-tenant and the head landlord. That last matter seems important to me, because, if the second defendant is right, he would have to show that the Acts have the effect of creating a contractual relationship of some kind between the mortgagees, on the one hand, and the second defendant, on the other. Unless it were somehow or other implied, it is clear that no such contractual relationship exists. I think that, if a person having title paramount, as the mortgagees have, was to be treated as a head landlord is to be treated, it would have been necessary to insert a provision creating and defining the relationship. I add, further, that it seems to me that if these Acts had intended so to affect the statutory power to exclude the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 99 (1), which is given by s. 99 (13), I should have expected to find (in Acts dealing with a subject-matter to some extent of the same kind, viz., the relationship of mortgagors and mortgagees and landlords and tenants), some reference and provision accordingly.

Referring to Martin v. Watson and Egan (4), an Irish case, the Law Notes book on these Acts, Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions, 21st ed., p. 94, states :

> "It has been held in Ireland that the lessee of a mortgagor claims under him and gets the benefit of the Act as against the mortgagee, though the lease be void as against the mortgagee."

Like Vaisey, J., I take the view that Martin v. Watson (4) does not establish that proposition, or, at least, it does not establish that the protection given to the lessee is a protection against eviction where the mortgagee is entitled to assert, and is asserting, his paramount title. What Martin v. Watson (4) decided was that (on the facts of that case) the lessee of the mortgagor was protected against having the mortgage called in.

Counsel for the second defendant made this further point, based on the specific provisions of this mortgage, that, by the proviso to cl. 4, which I have read, the mortgagees could not, in any event, assert their title paramount until three lunar months had passed from the default of the mortgagor, and that, so to speak, renders far less precarious the title or interest conferred by the mortgagor on the second defendant. It, no doubt, does, but, assuming that the conditions which enable the mortgagees to assert their right do arise, then it seems to me that the position is in no way made different because the mortgagees could not for a period assert them. It does not mean that, because there is a period when the mortgagees cannot claim possession, they are for all time bound by anything which may be done during that period. I, therefore, venture to think that the special terms of this mortgage do not help counsel for the second defendant on the main point.

For the reasons which I have stated, I have ventured to express a view differing from that of the learned judge. It is plain, I think, that Vaisey, J., found the matter one of difficulty, but the real basis of his conclusion rests, I think, on the answer he gave to the question he put to himself ([1949] 1 All E.R. 694) :

> "I have said that this case, in my judgment, depends on whether at the relevant time the possession of the second defendant was lawful."

He came to the conclusion, and I agree with him, that the possession was lawful in the sense that there was nothing unlawful in the grant by the mortgagor to the second defendant of his tenancy. The mortgagees could not have prevented it and had nothing whatever to do with it, but it was still not binding on them. It was a matter effective only between the parties to the particular contract. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that it is not sufficient to say that the lease was lawful in the sense that it was not an infringement of some covenant between mortgagees and mortgagor or that it was not otherwise unlawful in the sense that it was contrary to some statutory provision. I agree that it is necessary to determine the character of the tenancy at the time when proceedings are started, and one must, therefore, ask what is the nature of the tenancy at that time. I am bound, I feel, to answer that, though it was a tenancy lawful and effective between the parties to it, it was ineffective in law against someone asserting, as the mortgagees were at that time asserting, a title paramount.

The point is a short one, and we have been much assisted by the careful argument on both sides, but, in the end, it is a matter of construing relatively few provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. As I have indicated, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal should succeed and that the mortgagees are entitled to possession, and are not prevented from obtaining it by the operation of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree. In construing s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933, which is the primary protecting section, one must read it with sched. I to the Act to which it refers. In every paragraph of sched. I one finds a reference either to the tenant or to the landlord or to both. One must also, in my opinion, construe this section with all the other sections, and another very relevant section to consider is s. 15 of the Act of 1920. Section 15 (1) provides for what is to happen when a tenant has successfully asserted the right conferred on him by the Act. It is unnecessary to read it, but it provides, as is well known, that substantially the terms of what was previously a contract of tenancy shall govern the rights and obligations as between the parties. It, therefore, seems to me that the primary purpose of the Acts is to enable tenants to assert certain rights and to remain in possession as against landlords who are seeking to obtain possession and would, but for the provisions of the Acts, be entitled to possession. The second defendant said : "I am a tenant. That is why I am here." "But," replied the mortgagees, "the transaction under which you became and claim to be a tenant is not one which binds us." So far as the law is concerned, to which we have been referred—counsel for the second defendant referred to a number of cases—I accept the passages already cited by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS from the judgment of FARWELL, J., in Iron Trades Employers Insurance Assocn., Ltd. v. Union Land and House Investors, Ltd. (2), and from the statement by the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in Corbett v. Plowden (3) as sufficient for the purposes of this decision.

The question, therefore, as it seems to me, is whether the second defendant can assert the rights which the Acts confer on a tenant as against mortgagees who are not bound by the contract of tenancy under which the second defendant became tenant, the mortgagees claiming by what is usually called a title paramount. Prima facie, it seems to me he is not. It is against landlords or persons who can be described as in the position of landlords that the Acts are giving protection. Of course, there may be provisions in the Acts which displace that prima facie scope and ambit. Counsel for the second defendant relies on the definition of "landlord" in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. I agree with what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that there must be some limitation on the meaning of those words. I agree that some extension of the definition in s. 12 (1) (f) is necessary to meet the situation created by the application of ss. 5 (5) and 15 (3) of the Act of 1920, which confer the benefits of the Act on sub-tenants. I am not quite sure whether these words would be necessary to bring within the scope of the Act what I may call the statutory landlords, because, when we get to the expansion of the word "tenant," it is not thought necessary to use words which cover expressly a statutory tenant. It may be that the position between what are called statutory landlords and statutory tenants was thought to be sufficiently covered without these words. I also think it is clearly necessary that some words should be inserted having regard to the fact that in the latter part of s. 12 (1) (g) the word "tenant" is extended so as to include a widow or other members of the family who may be residing with a tenant who has died. For these reasons, therefore, I cannot accept the definition of "landlord" in s. 12 (1) (g) as by itself enabling a tenant to claim the protection of the Acts as against a mortgagee who is in the position of the mortgagees in this case. I think an express clause would be necessary to enable such an extension of the provisions of the Acts to be successfully asserted by someone in the position of the second defendant. I am reinforced in that view by the argument which has been already stated by the Master of the Rolls with regard to ss. 5 (5) and 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 dealing with sub-tenants.

The learned judge thought that the issue here was whether the possession was lawful. I do not think that is the real issue. I think one reason why there is a difficulty in approaching the question in that way is to be found in the provisions of s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920. If all that it was necessary to do was to show that someone was lawfully in the premises as a tenant, but was the tenant of someone other than the plaintiff suing to recover possession and did not claim title under the plaintiff, then, as it seems to me, the provisions to be found in s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) would be unnecessary. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the second defendant cannot claim the protection which he seeks, and I can see arguments for the non-insertion of the special clause which would have been necessary if people in his position were to be protected. It may be that there are arguments either way, but we are not concerned in this court with the weighing of one against the other.

The only other point on which I would like to add a word relates to the last argument of counsel for the second defendant. It was suggested, and I think probably rightly, that, if the mortgagor in a case like this sought to get possession as against someone to whom he had let the mortgaged property in the circumstances which we are considering, that person, if the property was a dwelling-house separately let, could assert as against the mortgagor the benefits conferred by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, and, if he did so successfully, he would become a statutory tenant. It is unnecessary to decide what would be the position if a mortgagee, as against someone who had reached that position, sought to assert the right which the mortgagees are asserting in this case. All I want to say is that at the moment I do not feel that there would be any anomaly in coming to the same conclusion in those circumstances, although counsel for the second defendant submitted that there would be. Therefore, that part of the argument did not affect me in the conclusion to which I have come with regard to the other points. For these reasons, I think that this appeal must be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I also agree. In view of the full reasons given by my brethren with which I agree, I hope it will not be thought disrespectful to the learned judge from whom we are differing if I say that for those reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed without adding any further reasons of my own.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ALLIANCE BUILDING SOCIETY v. VARMA AND ANOTHER.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.), June 28, 29, 1949.]

Mortgage—Possession of mortgaged property—"Person in . . . possession of the property"—Stranger to mortgage—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A.

R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, provides: "Any mortgagee . . . may take out as of course an originating summons, returnable in the chambers of a judge of the Chancery Division, for such relief of the nature or kind following as may by the summons be specified, and as the circumstances of the case may require; that is to say . . . Delivery of possession . . . to the mortgagee or person entitled to the charge by the mortgagor or person having the property subject to the charge or by any other person in, or alleged to be in possession of the property."

By a conveyance dated Sept. 28, 1945, the mortgagor acquired property which, by a mortgage of the same date, he charged to the plaintiffs with the payment by instalments of the sum secured. Before Sept. 28, 1945, the mortgagor had been permitted by the vendors to enter into possession of the property and he agreed with the second defendant that she should go into possession of the property as a tenant at will. In 1948, the instalments having fallen into arrears, the plaintiffs took out an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, against the second defendant claiming possession. Romer, J., held that, the second defendant being a stranger in title to the mortgage, the plaintiffs were not competent to bring proceedings for possession under r. 5A, and that the proper proceeding was by action commenced by writ. On appeal,

Held: the words "or by any other person in, or alleged to be in possession of the property" in R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, gave the court power to make an order for delivery up of possession to the plaintiffs against the second defendant as being a person in possession of the property, even though she was neither the mortgagor nor a person claiming to derive title under him.

Case referred to:

(1) Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Nevitt, [1940] 3 All E.R. 237; 163 L.T. 234; 2nd Digest Supp.

Appeal by mortgagees from an order of Romer, J., dated March 9, 1949, dismissing an originating summons under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, by which they sought possession of premises subject to the mortgage.

The mortgagor did not appear to the summons and the learned judge held that an order under the rule could not be made against the second defendant who was occupying the premises as a tenant at will by permission of the mortgagor. The Court of Appeal now held that the remedy was available against the second defendant and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R.

Denys Buckley for the mortgagees.

The mortgagor and the second defendant were not represented.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: In this case a short question is raised regarding the effect of certain words in R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A. The present proceedings are by way of originating summons expressed to be taken out under this Order and rule, and the parties to the action are the plaintiffs, the Alliance Building Society, and the two defendants, Devanchand Varma and Nadine Nicholaena Legat, a widow. The plaintiffs sue as mortgagees of premises known as Warberry House, Bishopsdown Park, Tunbridge Wells, which is a mansion house and other buildings, including cottages, all of which were subject to a mortgage created in 1945 by the first defendant, the mortgagor, in favour of the plaintiffs. The mortgagor acquired these premises by a contract in August, 1945, which was completed on Sept. 28, 1945, the date of the mortgage. In the meantime, however, by arrangement with the vendors, the mortgagor was given authority to go into possession of the premises. He did not go into occupation himself, but he made an agreement—I am not referring to any written document—with the second defendant whereby she should go into possession as his tenant, the evidence indicating that there was then in contemplation the preparation and execution of a lease from the mortgagor to the second defendant. That lease was never executed, and the second defendant remained in occupation, certainly of the mansion house and possibly of parts of the other premises, as a tenant at will. It will, therefore, be observed that the tenancy originated when the mortgagor had not acquired the property and before the date of the mortgage. Not long after these transactions the mortgagor went to his native country, now known as the Dominion of Pakistan, without paying all the instalments under the mortgage, and in Oct., 1948, when these proceedings started, there was some £1,900 arrears owing to the plaintiffs. When this application for an order for possession under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, came before Romer, J., the defendants were the mortgagor himself, who has not appeared and has taken no part in the proceedings, and a person who did not derive her title under the mortgagor in his capacity as mortgagor since the tenancy began before the date of the mortgage. She was a person in occupation, and the plaintiffs say that she is a mere trespasser.

The question is whether it is competent for a mortgagee to proceed under this Order to obtain an order for delivery up of possession against some stranger in title to the mortgage who is said to be merely a trespasser. If that is so, it involves an appreciable departure from the older practice and procedure, and it may be said to deprive defendants of the right to plead possession as such. On that ground Romer, J., decided that he could not make an order under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, and dismissed the summons. It is from that dismissal that the present appeal comes.

The relevant words of the rule are :

> " Any mortgagee . . . may take out as of course an originating summons, returnable in the chambers of a judge of the Chancery Division, for such relief of the nature or kind following as may by the summons be specified, and as the circumstances of the case may require ; that is to say . . . Delivery of possession . . . to the mortgagee or person entitled to the charge by the mortgagor or person having the property subject to the charge or by any other person in, or alleged to be in possession of the property."

The words " or by any other person in, or alleged to be in possession of the property " are the vital words which were added in 1940. On the fact of it those words, as a matter of ordinary language, must cover anybody who is in fact in, or is alleged to be in, possession of the property, unless the word " possession " is to be read as being confined in some way to a person deriving title under the mortgagor and entitled to legal possession as distinct from occupation. The amendment of the rule in 1940 has something of a history, which I do not want to deal with at great length, but under Ord. 13, r. 8, and Ord. 27, r. 7, provision is made in the case of an action to recover possession of land for the plaintiff's right, in the one case in default of appearance and in the other case in default of defence, to obtain an order summarily for possession. I only need to refer to one because the only difference is that they relate to the two different classes of case. By Ord. 13, r. 8, it is provided that :

> "In case no appearance shall be entered in an action for the recovery of land, within the time limited by the writ for appearance, or if an appearance be entered but the defence be limited to part only, the plaintiff shall be at liberty to enter a judgment that the person whose title is asserted in the writ shall recover possession of the land, or of the part thereof to which the defence does not apply, upon the production of a certificate by the solicitor A for the plaintiff or, in the case of a plaintiff in person, of an affidavit that the action is not one to which r. 17 of this Order applies."

Rule 17 is in these terms:

> "In any action in which the plaintiff is claiming any relief of the nature or kind specified in Ord. 55, r. 5A, no judgment shall be entered in default B of appearance without leave of the court or a judge who may require the application for leave to be supported by such evidence as might be required if relief were being sought on originating summons under Ord. 55, r. 5A, and may require notice of such evidence to be given to the defendant and to such other person (if any) as the court or a judge may think proper."

The last sixteen words were also added in 1940.

C The effect appears to be that where a mortgagee could proceed under Ord. 55, r. 5A, but, in fact, proceeds by writ, and there is no appearance or no defence to that writ, he cannot obtain summary judgment, but is subject to having imposed on him such terms as the court might think proper in the way of evidence, giving notice, and so on, in a proceeding under Ord. 55, r. 5A. If a certificate can be given that the matter could not have been D litigated under Ord. 55, r. 5A, that limitation does not arise. It is plain that the addition to Ord. 55, r. 5A, followed on a case in this court in 1940, in which a full court consisting of five Lords Justices sat—Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Nevitt (1). In that case the mortgagee had issued proceedings by writ against the mortgagor's wife who was living on the premises, asserting that the wife was a mere trespasser and claiming possession against E her. It was suggested that the certificate could be given because the wife was not a person covered by the language in Ord. 55, r. 5A, as it then stood. The court regarded that application as an abuse of the process of the court on the ground that it was manifest that the mortgagor's wife could not be regarded as a trespasser and that she was plainly a person who was properly in possession or occupation of the mortgagor's house, but there seems no doubt that it was F to meet the possibility of writs being issued in similar cases where some person other than the mortgagor was in occupation of the property and it might be said that the matter did not fall within Ord 55, r. 5A, that the words to which I have alluded were added to the rule. We are not, of course, entitled to be influenced, in construing these words of the rule, by what may have been the intention when they were added, but, my view being that the words in the G rule do cover such a case as the present, it is some comfort to me to think that the rule as so construed does give effect to the intention at the time. Having considered the matters to which I have referred and the case which I have cited, my view is that this rule, on its fair meaning and notwithstanding the use of the word "possession" in lieu, perhaps, of "occupation," covers such a case as the present, and does entitle the court to make an order for delivery up of H possession to the mortgagee against a person in occupation, even though that person is neither the mortgagor nor a person claiming to derive title under him in the sense of having a right to redemption.

That being so, there only remains the question of the form of the order. The second defendant is in occupation of the mansion house and the right order to make will be an order that she deliver up to the plaintiffs within the proper time possession of the premises described in the schedule to the summons or such part thereof as she now occupies. As the mortgagor is not in occupation of anything, no order is required against him, and, therefore, it appears to be proper not to make any other order on the summons save to give to the plaintiffs the right to add their costs of the summons and of the appeal to this court to their security.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. We have only a short note of what the learned judge said below, but it would appear that he proceeded on the basis that Ord. 55, r. 5A, should not apply unless the person against whom possession A is sought is claiming through the mortgagor. We have had the advantage in this court of a much fuller argument, and I have come to the clear conclusion that the rule, as it now stands, cannot be so restricted. The only other point is with regard to the meaning of the words "deliver up possession," and I desire to add nothing to what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS said on that point. I would like to add that, if the rule was limited in the way the learned judge B suggested, the result would, I think, be inconvenient. I do not think anyone would get any greater protection, and the result would be that it might not be clear whether the procedure of the rule applied until the matter had been investigated to a considerable extent. It is always inconvenient if after investigation a party finds that he has started on the wrong road. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed. C

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

Re KAVANAGH. Ex parte THE BANKRUPT v. JACKSON (The Trustee). E

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, L.J., and Romer, J.), May 23, June 27, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—Claim by bankrupt for damage to reputation and property—Settlement of action—Apportionment of agreed damages—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 38 (a). F

The bankrupt carried on business as a farmer and in 1946 she got into financial difficulties. She consulted B., a solicitor, who acted for her until September, 1947, when he gave her notice that he could no longer act on her behalf. On Sept. 13, 1947, a few days after the notice, B. called a meeting of the bankrupt's creditors, giving the bankrupt notice of the meeting and requesting that she should be present. At the meeting, which G the bankrupt attended, B. explained the bankrupt's position. The creditors refused to accept a composition and were of the opinion that the law of bankruptcy should take its course. A bankruptcy notice was later served on the bankrupt by a creditor, W., Ltd., for whom B. had acted for some time and continued so to act after he had ceased to represent the bankrupt. On Nov. 7, 1947, the bankrupt issued a writ H against B. claiming an injunction to restrain him from disclosing confidential information which he had obtained from her as her solicitor and damages. It was alleged in her statement of claim that B. was guilty of breaches of professional confidence in disclosing her affairs to the meeting of creditors and to certain individual creditors, and that she had as a result suffered irreparable loss of credit and reputation, and had been prevented from managing her financial affairs to the best advantage so as to avoid bankruptcy, and had been denied credit. As special damages she claimed (i) costs of appearing at and defending the bankruptcy proceedings ; (ii) costs of defending an originating summons issued by a bank in respect of a mortgage, and (iii) loss of profit in the manufacture and sale of ice cream. On Nov. 11, 1947, a receiving order was made against the bankrupt, and adjudication followed on Dec. 3, 1947. The bankrupt's action against B. never came to trial, and on Feb. 22, 1949, it was settled by the payment of £1,000 by B. together with the bankrupt's party and party costs. The trustee in bankruptcy made no application in the action, although on Nov. 10, 1948, he wrote to the bankrupt's solicitors saying that in reliance on the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38, he would claim any sum recovered in the action as assets in the bankruptcy. On Mar. 4, 1949, the trustee notified all persons concerned by letter that he claimed the £1,000. B. paid the £1,000 into the county court to abide the decision of the court (less £50 which had been paid into court during the currency of the action and taken out by the bankrupt). The trustee moved in the county court for a declaration that the whole of the money in court was payable to him. It was agreed at the hearing that the bankrupt would have become bankrupt in a fortnight or so irrespective of B.'s act in calling a meeting of creditors, and the bankrupt argued that, therefore, the acts of B. had not resulted in any damage to her property, but that the whole £1,000 was attributable to damage to her personally in respect of her credit or reputation and was, therefore, payable to her. The trustee argued that there was equally no case to show damage to her credit or reputation in view of her impending bankruptcy and that the £1,000 must vest in him under s. 38.

HELD : the £1,000 was paid to extinguish the claims of the bankrupt in respect of both heads of claim and there was no presumption arising under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (a), that it must be applied for the benefit of the creditors ; in the absence of evidence to show in what shares it should be apportioned, it should be divided equally between the two heads ; and, therefore, the bankrupt was entitled personally to one moiety and the trustee to the other.

(1) Wilson v. United Counties Bank, Ltd., [1920] A.C. 102 ; 88 L.J.K.B. 1033 ; 5 Digest 974, 7971.

APPEAL from an order of His Honour JUDGE KINGSLEY GRIFFITH made at Scarborough County Court on Apr. 6, 1949, whereby he directed the apportionment of £1,000 paid into the county court as to £300 to Mrs. Kavanagh, a bankrupt, personally, and £700 to her trustee in bankruptcy. The Court of Appeal now varied the order, apportioning the money equally between the bankrupt and the trustee. The facts are set out in the headnote.

M. V. S. Hunter for the bankrupt.

Aronson, K.C., for the trustee in bankruptcy.

JENKINS, L.J. [having stated the facts :] At the hearing before the learned county court judge the case was argued on the footing that the bankrupt was on the verge of bankruptcy and would have gone bankrupt in a fortnight irrespective of the act of Mr. Bagshawe (the bankrupt's former solicitor) in calling the meeting of creditors. On those facts it was argued for the bankrupt that the acts of Mr. Bagshawe complained of in the action had not resulted in any damage to the bankrupt's property, and that, therefore, the whole of the £1,000 was attributable to damage to her personally, i.e., damage to her credit or reputation, and, being wholly so attributable, was payable to her notwithstanding her bankruptcy. On the other hand, it was argued for the trustee that, inasmuch as the bankrupt would have gone bankrupt anyhow within a matter of days, there was equally no case to show any damage to her credit or reputation, and that, prima facie, the £1,000 was property acquired by her before her discharge which must vest in the trustee under s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, unless brought within one of the recognised exceptions.

As to the law to be applied, there is no difference between the parties. They accept, as they must and as this court must, the statement of the law contained in the well known decision of the House of Lords in Wilson v. United Counties Bank, Ltd. (1) where their Lordships' House, after reviewing all the authorities, affirmed the principle that damages recovered in respect of injury to credit and reputation, as opposed to damages recovered in respect of injury to property, do not pass to the trustee in the plaintiff's bankruptcy. The questions for the learned county court judge, therefore, were whether this sum of £1,000 should be treated as attributable to the bankrupt's claim for damage to her credit and reputation exclusively or whether it should be treated as attributable to her claim in respect of damage to her property exclusively, or whether it should be treated as attributable partly to one and partly to the other branch of her claim, and, if so, in what proportions. The learned county court judge, in a note of his judgment, says :

> "It is agreed on the authority of Wilson v. United Counties Bank, Ltd. (1) that the money is payable to the bankrupt in so far as it represents damage to her health, peace of mind, credit or reputation, and to the trustee in so far as it represents damage to her estate. I have no allocation of the sum to these different heads of damage by any judge or jury or in the endorsement on counsel's briefs. Evidence was called before me by the trustee only and on that evidence counsel for the trustee argued that there was no damage to the bankrupt's reputation, and counsel for the bankrupt (in complete contradiction of his own client's affidavit) that there was no damage to her estate. I entirely agree with both of them and so find. It follows that the payment of £1,000 rests upon an entirely artificial basis, and that does not help me much in deciding on the allocation and it seems to me that since the true facts give me no guidance, I must have regard to the fictitious assumptions upon which the payment was made."

The learned judge goes on to describe what he calls the fictitious assumptions which were to the effect that it must have been assumed for the purposes of the settlement that Mr. Bagshawe's action either caused or accelerated the bankrupt's bankruptcy, meaning by " accelerated " that his action had brought it on substantially sooner than it would otherwise have happened, if it would have happened at all. I think also, although the learned judge is not so clear on this, that the parties must have assumed that there was some damage to her estate inasmuch as both kinds of damage, that is to say, damage to her credit and reputation and damage to her estate, were pleaded. He says :

> " But, on the assumption that she would not have gone bankrupt but for the acts of Mr. Bagshawe, there must have been damage both to her estate and to her credit and reputation, and both kinds of damage were pleaded and must be regarded as having been assessed in the settlement. In these circumstances there must be an allocation, and I can only make as intelligent a guess as I can at the proportions. I allot £300 to the bankrupt. It is an absurd sum in view of the uncontradicted evidence that financially she was practically devoid of credit or reputation and that no evidence of stress of mind or body has been given. But it is no more absurd than the allocation of £700 to the trustee for damage to the estate which is equally baseless. That is the best allocation that I can make, basing myself, not on the facts, which lead nowhere, but on the assumptions necessarily underlying Mr. Bagshawe's payment."

From that judgment the bankrupt has appealed and counsel has argued on her behalf that she should have been allowed the whole of the £1,000 or, at all events, a larger proportion of the £1,000 than the £300 at which the learned county court judge arrived. In my judgment, the bankrupt's claim was, on the face of it, of a very flimsy character if one has regard to the admitted facts about her financial position at the material time. I think the learned county court judge was quite right in taking, as he did, the view that no damage had been shown to be caused in fact either to her property or to her credit and reputation. Counsel for the bankrupt has pressed us to say that, be that as it may, we should, nevertheless, hold that the whole of this £1,000 is attributable to the estimate of the parties of Mr. Bagshawe's hypothetical liability to the bankrupt as damages for a gross breach of his duty to her in the confidential relation in which he stood to her as her solicitor. For my part, I see no justification for that submission. This case was never tried out. One will never know now what the result might or might not have been. In fairness to Mr. Bagshawe, I must say that he did, in his defence, plead facts which, if substantiated at the hearing, would have gone far to absolve him from any breach of confidence at all, or, if there had been technically a breach of confidence, in the circumstances it would have been a most venial one. The position according to him was that he was acting under the instructions of the bankrupt to try and get time for her from the creditors and he made a certain promise to the creditors with her authority which behind his back she broke in a way which, in his view, made it his duty to call the creditors together. I am not going to assume without any evidence that Mr. Bagshawe was in all the circumstances of the case guilty of any such gross breach of confidence towards the bankrupt as would have entitled her to substantial damages. Mr. Bagshawe is a professional man, who had acted, I think, rashly in the course he took of representing William Cornforth (Whitby), Ltd., one of the creditors, having regard to the fact that he had only lately acted for the bankrupt. I think he was imprudent in taking the leading part he did in calling the creditors together and trying to see what terms could be made with them when he was no longer acting for the bankrupt. He, being a professional man, would naturally not wish charges of the kind contained in the statement of claim in this action to be publicly made against him, however ill-founded they might be shown to be. That type of litigation is obviously of the most damaging kind to a professional man, whether it is justified or not, and in those circumstances I think it reasonably plain that Mr. Bagshawe wanted to settle and that it was worth his while to pay for a settlement a sum which the bankrupt would be prepared to accept, and, if she would not be prepared to accept anything less, a sum perhaps much larger than she could be reasonably expected to recover in the action if it was fought out, the advantage to Mr. Bagshawe being simply the avoidance of publicity most undesirable to him as a person engaged in the profession of a solicitor. That accounts for the quantum of the payment, £1,000. The parties did not think it necessary to apportion it in any way between the various heads of claim, and I should be very much surprised to find there had been any attempt to do so. At all events, so far as the evidence before us is concerned, there was no such attempt. It was simply a sum of £1,000 plus taxed party and party costs paid in full satisfaction of all claims.

As to the destination of the payment as between the bankrupt personally and the trustee in bankruptcy, I think a possible view would be the one submitted by counsel for the trustee, namely, that prima facie all property accruing to the bankrupt before her discharge would, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38, vest in the trustee in bankruptcy as assets divisible among her creditors, and that, accordingly, the onus must be on the bankrupt to displace the presumption, so to speak, that this acquisition of £1,000 must be for the benefit of the creditors in the bankruptcy. If that view were right, I think it would follow from the learned judge's conclusion, with which I agree, that no damage either way is shown, that the whole sum would have to go A to the trustee in accordance with the general rule. That view is at first sight the logical one, and, as such, perhaps, attractive, but I think it ignores the very important circumstance that, after all, this sum was recovered in settlement of all claims in an action brought by the bankrupt herself in which she claimed not only damages in respect of injury to her property but also damages for injury to her credit and reputation. It was a sum in effect paid to B extinguish those two classes of claims. Therefore, it seems to me, it must prima facie be treated as attributable to both classes of claims. I see no justification for treating it as wholly attributable to damage for injury to credit and reputation, and I see no more reason for treating it as wholly attributable to the other matters. It is attributable to both, and the parties did not think it necessary to apportion it between the two. C

I further agree with the learned county court judge that there is nothing to guide the court in arriving at an apportionment, but that an apportionment should be made notwithstanding that no guidance is forthcoming. I part company with him in my ultimate conclusion. It seems to me that, if there is a sum which is apportionable between two heads of claim and if there is no evidence to show in what particular shares it should be apportioned, the D only possible solution is to make the apportionment equally between the two heads of claims. To give more to one than to the other can only be right on the footing that there is some reason for saying that more is attributable to one than to the other. Unless there is some evidence to fix the unequal proportions, I think the proportions should be equal. Therefore, in my judgment, the correct solution in this somewhat unusual and curious case is E to allow the appeal and vary the order of the county court judge by declaring that the total sum of £1,000 should be divided equally between the bankrupt and the estate, £500, including of course the £50 already paid to her, going to the bankrupt for her own personal use, and the balance going to the trustee.

There remains the question of costs incurred by the bankrupt in recovering the sum of £1,000. The bankrupt received in settlement, in addition to the F £1,000, her taxed party and party costs of the action. That would not cover the difference, which may be fairly substantial between the party and party costs and the solicitor and client costs incurred. I think those costs ought to be met out of the sum recovered and borne equally by the parties participating in that sum. It, therefore, seems to me that the proper way of dealing with the costs will be to deduct the amount of the taxed party and party costs and G also that of the solicitor and client costs from the total so as to make the equal division apply to the net sum cleared of all costs incurred in recovering it. As regards the costs of this appeal, as the bankrupt has succeeded I think the proper order would be that the trustee should pay her costs of this appeal which can be taken out of the trustee's share of the fund.

ROMER, J.: I agree. The principal difficulty in this case arises from H its want of reality.

The learned county court judge examined the evidence and came to the conclusion, first, that there was no damage to the bankrupt's reputation, and, secondly, that there was no damage to the bankrupt's estate. In regard to her reputation—the main thing which the bankrupt is relying on here—the only direct evidence, apart from presumed damage, is contained in an affidavit which she swore in the county court, and is of damage to her health through worry, stress and strain, and so on. Although I am far from denying she may have suffered worry, stress and strain, it did not, so far as I can see, flow directly from the breach of confidence by Mr. Bagshawe, of which she was complaining. It flowed exclusively from the fact that she found herself in a state of insolvency. The only conceivable injury that I can imagine she might have sustained as a direct result of the breach of confidence, as distinct from her insolvent position, was a shock to her sensibilities occasioned by the belief that a solicitor had been guilty of some impropriety. The bankrupt did not venture to formulate a claim based on that, but founded her allegations on the claim in the affidavit to which I have referred. In those circumstances I confess to considerable sympathy with the submission of counsel for the trustee which was to the effect that from the learned county court judge's finding of fact there was no damage to reputation, and, having regard to the burden of proof that rests in these cases, arising as it does from the provisions of s. 38, then logically the whole of this sum ought to have gone to the trustee, who had no burden of proof to discharge at all. He had not got to prove that the sum was not within some exception to the general provisions of s. 38 of the Act ; it was for the debtor to prove the contrary. As JENKINS, L.J., has said, however, I think it is true to say that this approach does rather disregard what actually happened. Mr. Bagshawe was defending a case in which both kinds of damage, i.e., to property and reputation, were alleged and being pressed against him. He settled the litigation—principally, I suppose, to purchase peace—for this lump sum. I do not think it would be right to treat that sum as divorced from the claims in the proceedings. It has, I think, to be related to the whole of the claims which were adumbrated in the action, and it is not possible to attribute more importance to one claim than to another. If so, one gets away from the strict logic of the submission of counsel for the trustee and does give effect to what I think was the factual position. It only remains to apportion the sum in regard to the two claims. Inasmuch as it was paid in satisfaction of both sets of claims in the action and we know that there was no real substance so far as damages were concerned in relation to either, I find difficulty in appreciating how one can show a reasoned apportionment other than on an equal basis. I, accordingly, agree that it should be divided on an equal basis subject to the provision for costs to which my Lord has referred.

BARTRAM v. BARTRAM.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), June 29, 30, 1949.]

Desertion—Termination—No intention by deserting spouse to resume matrimonial home—Wife living as fellow lodger in same house as husband.

A husband, who was living with his wife in a house, P., left that house and went to live at another house in the same village where his mother resided with her adopted daughter. His wife refused to go with him solely because she did not wish to have anything more to do with him and preferred to earn her own living. In consequence, she became a deserting wife. After eighteen months the husband, in an attempt to compel his wife to end her state of desertion and resume married life with him, sold the house, P. Being unable to find other accommodation the wife went to live as a lodger at the other house. She slept in a room apart from her husband, avoided meeting him, and paid no attention to him as a husband, though at times she sat at the same table with him for meals. This mode of existence continued for a further eighteen months. On a question whether on these facts the wife had been guilty of desertion under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2 (b),

Held : desertion, once established, continues until it is proved to have been brought to an end ; the original desertion in the present case was not brought to an end by the parties merely living in the same house in the circumstances in which they did, which showed no intention by the wife to resume a matrimonial home ; and the husband was entitled to a decree on the ground of desertion.

Appeal by the husband from a judgment of His Honour Judge Carey-Evans, sitting as a commissioner in divorce, dated Feb. 22, 1949, refusing to grant to the husband a decree of divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the learned commissioner, and allowed the appeal.

Barry, K.C., and Alpe for the husband.

The wife did not appear.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour Judge Carey-Evans, sitting as a commissioner in divorce, whereby he refused to grant a decree to the husband on the ground of his wife's desertion for three years. The marriage took place on Aug. 5, 1932, and there is no issue. The petition was filed on Nov. 24, 1948. The wife did not enter an appearance, nor did she appear either before the judge or before this court. It is clear that she desires nothing more than a release from this bond of marriage which appears to her to be odious. She says that she is not made like ordinary women and hates sexual intercourse. When she was married she was engaged in teaching, and she went on teaching for five years. In 1937 the husband persuaded her to stop teaching, and she stopped until 1939, when she started teaching again in the village of Wymondham. Until 1943 the parties lived in a house called "Penlan" in Wymondham. The husband complained that his wife was not willing to look after him there, and in 1943 he left the house for business reasons, which seem adequate, and went to live in another house in Fairland Street, Wymondham. His mother was living there, and also the adopted daughter of the mother. The wife refused to leave A "Penlan" and go to Fairland Street, not because she disliked her mother-in-law or the house or because it was less convenient for her work. The only reason why she refused was because she did not want to have anything more to do with her husband. Her husband tried to get her back, but she steadily refused to go to live with him.

I have no doubt that the learned commissioner was right in holding that B as a result of that conduct the wife was a deserting wife. She ought to have gone to live with her husband and she steadily refused to do so without any good reason whatsoever. To try and force the wife to come back and live with him the husband sold "Penlan," and in February, 1947, when eighteen months of the period of three years necessary to establish desertion had expired she went to live at Fairland Street. I think she went there purely as a lodger because C there was no other accommodation in Wymondham available and she wanted to go on teaching at this school. She lived at Fairland Street till September, 1948, when she went to Northampton to teach.

In the house in Fairland Street there were, besides the bedrooms, two large living rooms, a kitchen, and the usual offices. The wife refused to sleep with her husband. She slept with the adopted daughter. She never went into his D room. She paid no attention to him as a husband. She never mended his clothes, or cooked for him, or went out with him, or treated him in any way differently from the way in which she would have treated another lodger in the house whom she cordially disliked. She did everything possible to avoid him, but there were certain times when she had to have meals in the house unless she went to a restaurant, and, consequently, there were times when E she actually sat at the same table with her husband eating the food provided for them. This court has to decide whether living in these circumstances in the same house as the husband terminated the desertion which had started in 1945. On the whole the commissioner accepted the husband's evidence. There is a passage in his judgment where he said that he thought there was some slight exaggeration as to the precise number of times when F they had meals in the same room, but he did not think that was of much importance.

The crucial passage in his judgment is this:

> "Now I quite agree with Mr. Alpe's reference to Mummery v. Mummery (1) which I interpret in this connection in this way. I think some very brief interlude in a desertion may not be sufficient to break a period of desertion, G but I think when they went on living in this manner for practically half the statutory period of desertion—March, 1947, to September, 1948—it is impossible to say that they were, within the principle of Hopes v. Hopes (2), living in fact separately during these eighteen months or so. That would really conclude the matter but for an additional argument of Mr. Alpe which I must mention. He says I ought to find there was desertion in 1943, and H that the case is distinguishable from Hopes v. Hopes (2) because of this prior desertion. I think that on the evidence I must hold that in 1943 the parties were living separately and the wife had got a deserting mind while the husband wanted her back, and she was guilty of desertion, but it doesn't alter the fact, so it seems to me, that the husband must prove at any rate the fact of separation throughout the statutory period of three years, and I cannot myself see that it makes any difference to the question whether they were living in one household or two that prior to that date, February, 1947, > she had been guilty of desertion. To my mind it does not make any difference at all. Obviously, it might make a great difference if one was enquiring into a question of intent, but I have already said I am satisfied on that aspect of the case. The difficulty in this case is whether they were living separately and that is all there is to the matter. I quite appreciate the husband has behaved well. He has tried to get her back and she has not stood by him as a wife ought to, but, as DENNING, L.J., pointed out in Hopes v. Hopes (2) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 925), gross neglect or chronic discord is not a ground for divorce though desertion is. I quite appreciate that both parties want the divorce to go through, but I am not entitled to grant a divorce unless the conditions of the Act of Parliament are complied with."

With great respect to the commissioner I do not think that he gave sufficient weight to the essential difference between this case and Hopes v. Hopes (2). I will not refer to the judgments in Hopes v. Hopes (2), because I think that for the purposes of this case it is more convenient to refer to the comments which LORD MERRIMAN, P., made on that case when he was presiding in the Court of Appeal (after Hopes v. Hopes (2) had been decided) in Everitt v. Everitt (3), where he said this ([1949] 1 All E.R. 917) :

> " The fundamental point about this part of the case is that it was decided by this court in Hopes v. Hopes (2) that the necessary element of separation cannot subsist when a husband and wife are living under the same roof unless they have ceased to share one household and have set up two households there."

In conjunction with that passage I may refer to another passage in a judgment, also by the learned PRESIDENT, in Mummery v. Mummery (1) where he said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 555) :

> " Similarly, I doubt whether any judge could give a completely exhaustive definition of cohabitation, and certainly I am not going to attempt to do so. At least a resumption of cohabitation must mean resuming a state of things —that is to say, setting up a matrimonial home together. That involves, so it seems to me, a bilateral intention on the part of both spouses so to do."

In Hopes v. Hopes (2) the husband failed to prove his case because he never succeeded in proving desertion. He never proved that there was any actual separation of husband and wife, although he did prove the intention on the part of the wife to desert. Therefore, the case failed on the threshold. In the present case, the husband has established actual desertion by the wife for many months. That being so, it seems to me that the husband is entitled to say that the desertion once established continues until it is proved that it has been brought to an end. The wife does not suggest for one moment that she brought it to an end. The question is : Do the facts proved establish that it was brought to an end ? In my view, it can only be brought to an end if the facts show an intention on the part of the wife to set up a matrimonial home with the husband. If the facts do not establish any intention on the part of the wife to set up a matrimonial home, the mere fact that, as a lodger, she went to live under the same roof as her husband, because she had nowhere else to go, does not remove the desertion which she had already started and which continued to run. For these reasons, in a case which is not free from difficulty, I think the husband has established desertion for the requisite three years, and that a decree ought to be granted in his favour. Therefore this appeal should be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : This seems to me a borderline case of very great difficulty, but for the reasons given by my Lord I also have come to the conclusion that he has expressed, and I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

It is clear that the husband, by selling the original matrimonial home, "Penlan," over the wife's head, succeeded in forcing her to leave that house and to go to Fairland Street, which was the only other accommodation available within reach of her work. Having regard to those and other proved circumstances in the case, it seems to me wrong to hold that the three years period was interrupted by any resumption of cohabitation, for such resumption involves, in A the language of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Mummery v. Mummery (1), a bilateral intention on the part of both spouses to set up a matrimonial home together. In my view, the facts proved in this case negative any such intention on the part of the wife who was not a free agent but was acting under the spur of combined necessity and convenience. For these reasons, and for the reasons given by my Lord, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

B DENNING, L.J. : I agree. Hopes v. Hopes (2) does not apply because there the period of desertion never began to run. Here the period of desertion had begun to run before the parties came to live together again under the same roof. Once the period of desertion has begun to run, it does not cease to run simply because the parties attempt a reconciliation and for that purpose come together again for a time. That was laid down by LORD MERRIMAN, P., in C Mummery v. Mummery (1) and has never been doubted since. Indeed, I would say in such a case the period of desertion does not cease to run unless, and until, a true reconciliation has been effected, as to which see Mackrell v. Mackrell (4). Any other view would greatly hamper attempts at reconciliation, because it would mean that the deserted party would be disinclined to take the other back for fear of losing his legal rights in case the reconciliation was unsuccessful. D It was held in Pratt v. Pratt (5) that it was the duty of the husband to respond to a reasonable offer of reconciliation ; and so he should not be penalised for so doing. In Everitt v. Everitt (3) the period of desertion was held to have ceased to run because the letter left by the wife was strong evidence that there had been a reconciliation. Nothing short of reconciliation, however, will suffice. Applying those principles to the present case, the commissioner found E that in 1945 the wife was guilty of desertion. The only question is whether that period ceased to run in 1947 and 1948 when the parties were living in the same house. The evidence shows that the husband was very willing to effect a reconciliation, but the wife never had any intention to go any part of the way to meet him. She had discovered that she was a woman who should never have been married. She had a complete abhorrence of all questions of sex and F regarded them as purely animal. She went to the house in 1947 merely as a lodger, and that is all she was. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Decree nisi from the date of judgment.

KRAJINA v. THE TASS AGENCY AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Singleton, L.JJ.), June 22, 23, 24, 27, 1949.]

Action—Who may be sued—Department of foreign sovereign State—Burden of proving separate legal existence—Evidence—Particulars under Registration of Business Names Act, 1916—Soviet news agency.

On June 2, 1948, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming damages for an alleged libel in an article in a weekly newspaper published by the first defendants on May 7, 1948. After entering a conditional appearance the first defendants applied to the court to set aside the writ on the ground that they were a department of the Soviet State and as such immune from suit. In those proceedings it was shown that in June, 1938, particulars were filed under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, by the second defendant, an English subject. The business was described as a telegraphic news agency, and in the particulars appended to the application it was stated " the business name and address of the foreign firm as agent for whom the business is carried on : Tass Agency, Moscow, U.S.S.R." On July 2, 1948, a month after the issue of the writ, further particulars under the Act were filed which showed that the second defendant had ceased to carry on the agency in August, 1946, and gave the name of another person, B. In these second particulars it was not stated that the agency was being carried on as agent for a Russian firm. By cl. 15 of the Russian statute establishing the Tass Agency it was provided that the agency should enjoy all the rights of a juridical person, and the Soviet Ambassador in Great Britain certified that the agency constituted a department of the Soviet State " exercising the rights of a legal entity." The master ordered the writ against the first defendants to be set aside and his decision was affirmed by BIRKETT, J. On appeal,

HELD : (i) having regard to the certificate of the ambassador that the Tass Agency was a department of the Soviet State, the burden of disproving that the agency constituted such a department was on the plaintiff ; the question must be decided by Russian law ; and the contents of the particulars under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, did not establish that the agency was an independent corporation liable to suit in the English courts ;

(ii) although the Soviet statute provided that the agency should enjoy all the rights of a juridical person and the Soviet Ambassador had certified that the agency had the rights of a legal entity, no evidence was before the court to show what were the essential requisites of a separate juridical existence under Soviet law ;

(iii) even if the agency was a State department having a separate entity, it did not follow that the Soviet government, by procuring its incorporation, had deprived it of the right to assert the immunity normally attaching to a department of a foreign State under international law, and, accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of BIRKETT, J., dated Dec. 10, 1948.

The plaintiff claimed damages for an alleged libel contained in an article headed " Betrayed British Troops to Gestapo " which appeared on May 7, 1948, in THE SOVIET MONITOR published by the first defendants. The first defendants, after entering a conditional appearance took out a summons asking that the C writ be set aside as they were a department of a foreign State, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and so entitled to immunity. The evidence on which this contention was based is referred to in the judgment of COHEN, L.J. The master's order setting aside the writ was upheld by BIRKETT, J., and the Court of Appeal now confirmed it and dismissed the appeal.

W. T. Wells for the plaintiff.

D Pritt, K.C., and Gahan for the defendants.

TUCKER, L.J. : I will ask COHEN, L.J., to deliver the first judgment in this case.

COHEN, L.J. : This appeal is against an order of BIRKETT, J., dated Dec. 10, 1948, whereby he affirmed an order of Master SIMNER dated Nov. 29, E 1948, by which it was ordered that the writ herein and service of it on the Tass Agency of Moscow be set aside. The writ was issued by the plaintiff on June 2, 1948, the defendants being described as " The Tass Agency (of Moscow) (trading as a firm or corporation at No. 72/78, Fleet Street in the city of London) and Frederick Taylor (trading as Tass Agency)." On June 10, 1948, a conditional appearance was entered on behalf of the first defendants, to F whom I shall refer hereafter as Tass, and on June 23, 1948, Tass issued a summons asking for the order which they ultimately obtained from Master SIMNER. Frederick Taylor entered an unconditional appearance to this writ, but denied that, at the material time, he was trading as Tass Agency. He is not a party to this application, and we are not concerned with his position on this appeal.

G In support of the application Tass filed an affirmation by a Mr. Andrienko, who is described as the legal adviser of the trade delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the United Kingdom. The affirmation contains a summary of some of the provisions of the statute concerning Tass, which was published on Jan. 15, 1935, and there was exhibited to it an extract from the statute, which contained the first of its sixteen clauses. In his affirmation H Mr. Andrienko described Tass as " the central information organ of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics " and as " coming under the Council of Ministers of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics." He did not make any definite statement as to the legal position of Tass, and the only other evidence before the master at the first hearing was an extract under the heading " Tass Agency " from the register kept under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916. The master rightly did not consider this evidence sufficient to enable him to reach a decision on the matter, and he adjourned the summons for further evidence. On Nov. 20 an affidavit by Percy Charles Smith was filed, to which was exhibited a certificate from the Soviet Ambassador, the material portion of which was in the following terms :

> " I, Georgi Nikolaevich Zaroubin, ambassador of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in Great Britain, hereby certify that the telegraph agency of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, commonly known as Tass, or the Tass Agency, constitutes a department of the Soviet State, i.e., the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, exercising the rights of a legal entity."

On this evidence the master made the order for which Tass asked and that order was confirmed by Birkett, J. Neither the master nor Birkett, J., gave any reasons for his judgment, but it is reasonably clear that both judgments were based on the decision of this court in Compania Mercantil Argentina v. United States Shipping Board (1), where a similar application was considered.

In that case the evidence before the court included a certificate of the American ambassador, and (131 L.T. 388) an affidavit of a Mr. Gregory, legal adviser to the defendants, a department of State of the United States of America, administered by commissioners nominated by the President of the United States. The defendants owned a large mercantile fleet which was used for ordinary commercial purposes in pursuance of the United States Shipping Act, 1916, which was passed with the object of creating and developing an auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States. The court allowed the application of the defendants and confirmed the decision of the lower court, by which the action was stayed. In the course of his judgment Bankes, L.J., said (131 L.T. 389) :

> " The question as to whether the vessel was or was not employed in private trading really does not arise in a case such as this where proceedings are taken in personam, and it is established to the satisfaction of the court that the body against whom the proceedings are taken is a body representing a Sovereign State."

It is to be observed, however, that in that case there was no evidence on which an argument could be based that the United States Shipping Board was a legal entity in any sense of that term. At any rate, if there was any such evidence, it is plain that it was not accepted by the court.

When the present appeal came before us, counsel for the plaintiff asked leave (which was granted) to put in further evidence which consisted of the full text of the statute establishing the Tass agency, and a translation thereof. Clause 1 is in these terms :

> " The telegraphic agency of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (TASS) is the central information organ of the U.S.S.R. and is attached to the Soviet of People's Commissars of the U.S.S.R."

It will be observed that this translation does not entirely agree with that in the exhibit to Mr. Andrienko's affirmation, the words, " and comes under the Council " in that exhibit being replaced by " is attached to the Soviet ", but I do not think that anything turns on that discrepancy. It seems clear that, in the light of the ambassador's certificate, we are bound to come to the conclusion that the Tass Agency is a department of the Soviet State, but whether that State has given this department a separate juridical existence is another matter which I shall consider later. Clause 2 defines the duties of Tass, in effect, as being the collection and dissemination of information throughout the U.S.S.R., whether such information might relate to the U.S.S.R. or to foreign States. Clause 3 gives Tass extensive rights to enable it to perform its duties. Clause 4 deals with the organisation to be established to enable it to perform its duties, and, in particular, in sub-cl. (a), provides that it shall organise abroad correspondence points and detachments and send there its special correspondents. Clauses 5 and 6 make it clear that the Soviet of People's Commissars retains full control of Tass. Clause 6 throws on the responsible director the sole responsibility for its activities, while cl. 5 provides A that he and his deputies are to be appointed by the Soviet. Clauses 7, 8 and 10 deal with the establishment of similar agencies in the constituent republics of the U.S.S.R., and with the relationship between these bodies and Tass itself. These clauses are immaterial to the point before us. Clause 9 states :

> "The telegraphic agency of the U.S.S.R. and the telegraphic agencies of the Union Republics operate on the principles of cost-accounting."

B Counsel for the plaintiff placed some reliance on this clause, but, as I find its import difficult to follow, I can derive no assistance from it. Clause 14 says :

> "The telegraphic agency of the U.S.S.R. and the telegraphic agencies of Union Republics enjoy all the rights of authorship for information disseminated by them by means of all branches of communications in C accordance with the laws in force concerning authors' rights."

The effect of that is to vest copyright in Tass so far as publications by Tass are concerned. Clause 15, on which the main argument turns, provides :

> "The telegraphic agency of the U.S.S.R. and the telegraphic agencies of the Union Republics enjoy all the rights of a juridical person."

D In the discharge of its activites in this country, Tass published a paper or rather a news sheet, called THE SOVIET MONITOR. This contained, in the issue dated May 7, 1948, the article which was the cause of complaint by the plaintiff in this action. It is unnecessary to give any advertisement to the terms of that article ; it is sufficient to say that we were told that, while THE SOVIET MONITOR is widely distributed, no charge is made to the recipient of the paper E or news sheet.

Clause 15 was, no doubt, the origin of the ambassador's statement that Tass exercised the rights of a legal entity. Counsel for the plaintiff said that, reading the statute as a whole, the effect is that Tass not only has the right of a legal entity, but is also a legal entity, thus distinguishing Tass from the United States Shipping Board in the case to which I have referred, where the F board was merely a department of the United States government without any separate legal existence. If that is established, certain consequences, it is argued, follow—in particular, the doctrine of sovereign immunity is not applicable, since Tass has a separate juridical existence from that of the sovereign, the U.S.S.R. Counsel for the plaintiff also argued that, even if the Tass agency was a department of the U.S.S.R. without separate legal existence, G the nature of its activities was such as to deprive it of sovereign immunity. He admitted that he could not succeed on that point before us in view of the decision of this court in the United States Shipping Board case (1) and the decision in The Porto Alexandre (2), but he said that the correctness of these decisions had been doubted by LORD MAUGHAM in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (3). For the plaintiff it was also argued that the H evidence before the court as to the status of the Tass agency was ambiguous and self-contradictory, and that, as the onus of establishing their right to immunity was on the defendants, their application must fail.

It is obvious that the first question we have to decide is whether or not the evidence makes out a prima facie case that Tass was a separate legal entity, for, if it was not, it seems quite plain that the evidence does establish that Tass was a department of the Soviet State, and, unless counsel for the plaintiff can establish it to be a separate legal entity, it is not disputed that this appeal, in this court at any rate, must fail. The argument on this point can, I think, be summarised as follows. The burden of proof that Tass is a legal entity rests, it is true, on the plaintiff, but Tass, by registering under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, has said that it is either a Russian firm or a Russian corporate entity and the rest of the evidence and the statute show that it is a corporate entity. To appreciate this argument it is necessary to look at the Act of 1916 and to the particulars which have been filed thereunder.

The following provisions are relevant to the matter before us. Section 1 :

> " Subject to the provisions of this Act . . . (b) Every individual having a place of business in the United Kingdom and carrying on business under a business name which does not consist of his true surname without any addition other than his true Christian names or the initials therefore ; (c) Every individual or firm having a place of business in the United Kingdom, who, or a member of which, has either before or after the passing of this Act changed his name, except in the case of a woman in consequence of marriage ; shall be registered in the manner directed by this Act."

Section 2 :

> " Where a firm, individual, or corporation having a place of business within the United Kingdom carries on the business wholly or mainly as nominee or trustee of or for another person, or other persons, or another corporation, or acts as general agent for any foreign firm, the first-mentioned firm, individual, or corporation shall be registered in manner provided by this Act, and, in addition to the other particulars required to be furnished and registered, there shall be furnished and registered the particulars mentioned in the schedule to this Act."

Section 7 imposes a penalty for default in registration, and s. 16 imposes a duty on persons who have been registered, if and when the firm or individual ceases to carry on business or there is any other relevant change, to file the requisite particulars with the registry. Section 22 contains a number of definitions, making it clear that in this Act an " individual " means a natural person, and does not include a corporation, and it contains this definition of the expression " foreign firm," which is mentioned in s. 2 : " ' Foreign firm ' shall mean any firm, individual, or corporation whose principal place of business is situate outside His Majesty's dominions." The schedule contains particulars of the form which has to be filled in. It has two columns. One is headed, " Description of firm, etc.", and the other is headed, " Additional particulars."

We have had before us evidence as to the particulars that were filed in relation to Tass under this Act. The first is to be found in an exhibit to the affidavit of Mr. Linnell, filed on the original application before the master. The particulars in question, which were filed on June 18, 1938, and registered on July 18, were as follows : " (1) Business name, Tass Agency ; (2) Nature of business, Telegraphic News Agency ; (3) Place of business, 115, Fleet Street, E.C.4." That is a different number in Fleet Street from that appearing in the writ, but I do not think it has any relevance to the matter which we have to decide. " (4) Christian name and surname of individual, Frederick Taylor." I can pass over the rest of the particulars, except for para. 12, " The business name and address of the foreign firm as agent for whom the business is carried on : Tass Agency, 13, Armiansky Pereulok, Moscow, U.S.S.R." I do not think that there can be any doubt that those particulars were filed pursuant to s. 2 of the Act.

That was the position so far as the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, was concerned, when the case came before the master and Birkett, J., but at the last moment, counsel for the plaintiff produced in this court another affidavit containing some further particulars. The first exhibit was an exhibit for all practical purposes in identical terms to that to which I have already referred. The second contained particulars dated July 2, 1948—a month after the issue of the writ—which stated that Frederick Taylor, of Tass Agency, 85, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4, ceased to carry on business on Aug. 31, 1946. The second, which was registered on June 5, 1948, gave particulars as follows, these particulars being filed under s. 1, not under s. 2, of the Act : " (1) Business name. Tass ; (2) Nature of business. News Agency ; (3) Place of business. 85, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4 "—another different number in Fleet Street from that appearing in the writ and the earlier particulars—" (4) Christian name and surname of individual. Michael Basharin " ; and there was no para. 12. Those are the defendants' particulars. It was contended for the plaintiff that they afford prima facie evidence, first, that Mr. Taylor was the agent of Tass Agency, and, secondly, that Tass was either a firm or, in the light of the other evidence, a firm in the eyes of Russian law. Having regard to the fact that Mr. Linnell's affidavit had been filed at an earlier date, and to the fact that no affidavit was filed suggesting that Mr. Taylor was not an employee of Tass agency, and, I might add, to the fact, according to one of those particulars and to what counsel for the defendants told us in court, that it was the agency who filed a statement that Mr. Taylor had ceased to be in their employ in 1946, it is, in my view, a reasonable inference that Mr. Taylor was the agent of Tass Agency, but counsel for the plaintiff said the position goes much further than that. Paragraph 12 of the particulars originally filed under the Act would have been unnecessary unless Tass was a foreign firm as defined in s. 22, and it could only be a foreign firm if it was either a firm, an individual, or a corporation. Therefore, it was argued, we should treat this as prima facie evidence that Tass is a foreign corporation since nobody suggests that it is either a firm or an individual.

I feel some difficulty in accepting that argument. It seems to me that the evidence as to the nature of Tass must depend on its constitution and must be a question of Russian law, and that we must look at the Russian statutes and to any relevant evidence that is adduced as to Russian law (and for all practical purposes in this case, that is nil) to determine whether or not Tass is a separate legal entity. Mr. Taylor, it seems to me, is wholly incompetent to give evidence on this subject. Even if what he said be regarded as prima facie evidence, I am bound to say that, looking at the rest of the evidence, I am unable to accept the view that Tass is a separate legal entity. What is the rest of the evidence ? Mr. Andrienko seems completely neutral on the subject. He does not cite—because he does not seem to have appreciated—the only relevant provisions in the statute, namely, cll. 14 and 15. The ambassador, if I may say so, showed a better appreciation of what was relevant, but he, perhaps not being a lawyer, perhaps out of caution, quotes practically the wording of the statute without expressing any opinion as to its legal effect. After saying that the Tass agency is a department of the Soviet State, he says that it exercises the rights of a legal entity. Does that mean that it is a legal entity ? When the argument first started to say that it meant the same thing seemed an attractive proposition, but on consideration, and having regard to what has happened in this court as regards departments of State, I am unable to think that we should be justified in treating this as establishing that Tass has a separate legal entity.

Counsel for the defendants referred us to the status of a number of government departments, which are set out in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 6. He began on p. 675, which deals with the Crown and the Executive, under s. 8, " The departments of State." He referred first to a number of departments as to which there was nothing to suggest that they were corporate entities or had any bearing on this subject, citing the Home

Secretary who, in para. 896, is said not to be capable of suing or being sued in his official capacity. The first deviation, so to speak, from the ordinary rule to which our attention was called was the Admiralty. The Admiralty are not liable to be sued except with respect to land, the remedy in other cases being by petition of right. As regards the War Office, the Secretary of State is liable to be sued in relation to certain matters which are referred to in paras. 921 and 922. The Air Council may sue and be sued and for all purposes be A described by that name, " but," says the learned author (ibid., para. 925) :

> " . . . it is probably not a corporation, and cannot, in any event, be sued as representing the Crown, or in such a way as to affect Crown property."

That was the conclusion reached by ATKIN, L.J., in Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (4). One other instance is the Ministry of Health : B

> " The Minister may sue and be sued by the name of the Minister of Health. For the purpose of acquiring and holding land, he is a corporation sole, and all land vested in him is held in trust for the Crown for the purposes of the Ministry of Health."

The Postmaster-General, for certain purposes, is also a corporation sole. In C all these cases it is clear that for certain purposes a department of State is incorporated, but counsel for the plaintiff did not venture to suggest that they were incorporated for all purposes, and that, in cases not specifically covered, they could be sued and be deprived of the immunity which normally attaches to a department of State.

Turning to the present case, it seems to me that, on the evidence, Tass falls, D so to speak, in a lower category so far as liability is concerned than does the Minister of Health. Our attention has been called to nothing which can be said to amount to a declaration that Tass is a corporation sole. It is said in the translation of the statute and by the ambassador that it has the rights of a juridical or legal entity, but it seems to me that the evidence falls far short of that which would be necessary to establish that Tass is a legal E entity and that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, by procuring its incorporation, has deprived that particular department of the immunity which normally attaches to a department of a sovereign State in accordance with the principles of comity established by international law and recognised by this country.

That is really sufficient to dispose of the case and to lead to the dismissal F of the appeal, but, as the case may go higher, I think I ought to say just a few words on what the position would be had I come to the opposite conclusion and been of opinion that the evidence did establish that Tass was given the status of a separate juridical entity. It does not seem to me necessary to follow that it would thereby have been deprived of its immunity. The history of the legislation in this country as regards the departments of State seems G to me to show that it is quite possible that a State may for certain purposes under its own legislation give some department of State the status and the rights of a juridical entity without depriving the department of its general immunity from suit, and it seems to me that it would be impossible to say—no doubt, our government would not wish to say—that the Crown had thereby deprived itself of the right to rely on that immunity if an attempt were made H to sue it in a foreign country. One must look in every case at the facts to reach a conclusion whether the Crown has intended to give up its immunity generally or only for limited and defined purposes.

Our attention was called to a number of American authorities which it was said, showed that departments in the position of Tass have no right to immunity. I do not find it necessary, in view of the conclusion which I have reached on the main point, to go through them in detail, but I think I can summarise the conclusion which I seek to draw from them by referring briefly to them. In Pilger v. United States Steel Corpn. (5), the question was as to the position of the Public Trustee. It seems to me that counsel for the defendants was right in saying that, having regard to the terms of the statute constituting the Public Trustee and of the trading with the enemy legislation under which he was made Custodian of Enemy Property, the legislature had made it plain that the Public Trustee was, for purposes of suit, to be regarded, not as an officer of State, but as a trustee liable to suit here and abroad in the same way as a private trustee. In Ulen & Co. v. Bank Gospodarstwa Krajowego (National Economic Bank) (6), the Polish National Economic Bank had been formed as a share company with commercial objectives, and it was plain from the whole history of the matter that the Polish State had intended to make it, not a department of State, but a commercial body which could be used by a department of State. So, too, in United States v. Deutsches Kalisyndikat Gesellschaft (7), where a question arose as to an agency for the sale of potash which had been founded by the French government to deal with potash produced in Alsace-Lorraine. It was plainly a société anonyme formed under French law in which the French government were majority shareholders, but not the sole shareholders. They retained the right to appoint the majority of the board and various other rights, and it was a necessary inference from the history of the matter that the French government had deliberately chosen to make this a commercial concern and not a department of State.

We were referred to certain other cases, which I do not think I need go through in detail. The inference I should draw from these American cases is (and to this extent I do not think I should quarrel with it) that a sovereign government may so incorporate a particular department of State as to make it plain that it is to be an ordinary trading, commercial, or business activity and not to be part of the State so that it can claim immunity, but I think it would be wrong to infer from these authorities, and I should not, without further argument, be prepared to accept the view, that it necessarily followed that, because a department of State was granted incorporation, it was deprived thereby of the right to assert its sovereign immunity in foreign courts. I need not say anything more on that aspect of the question in view of the conclusion which I have reached on the main point, that the evidence does not satisfy me in this case that Tass was a separate legal entity.

I desire to say one word more on the last point in the argument of counsel for the plaintiff that the evidence was ambiguous and self-contradictory, and that, as the onus of establishing their right to immunity is on the defendants, their application must fail. I think that turns upon what I have already said, that, in my view, the defendants do establish that Tass was, and in essence is, a department of State to the necessary extent to shift the onus of proving that they were a separate legal entity to the plaintiff. That onus, in my opinion, he has failed to discharge. For these reasons I think that the decision of BIRKETT, J., was right and ought to be affirmed.

TUCKER, L.J.: No question arises in the present appeal with regard to the immunity of diplomatic officers. The sole question is whether a body called the Tass Agency of Moscow has established that it is part and parcel of a sovereign independent State, namely, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It is common ground that the onus of establishing that lies on them. Furthermore, it is common ground that the certificate of their ambassador in this country is not conclusive of the matter, though, no doubt, it is evidence of very high evidential value, and, in a matter of this kind, I think it is probably the best kind of evidence that can be procured.

I desire to draw attention to one or two dates in this matter before I proceed further. The alleged libel complained of is stated to have been published in an issue of THE SOVIET MONITOR for May 7, 1948, and the writ in the present action was issued on June 2, 1948. In due course a conditional appearance was entered and proceedings were taken consequent thereupon in chambers to establish that the defendants were immune from suit. In the course of those proceedings and in the course of this appeal, it has been shown that until July 2, 1948—that is, a month after the issue of the writ in the present proceedings—there appeared in the register under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, an entry showing that an entity or a firm or something called Tass Agency, the nature of whose business was a telegraphic news agency, was registered as being the business name of one Frederick Taylor, a British subject, who was carrying on that business at 115, Fleet Street, E.C.4. The entry shows that he had been carrying it on from June 10, 1938. In those particulars, para. 12 requires to be stated the business name and address of the foreign firm as agent for whom the business is carried on, and that is stated to be " Tass Agency, 13, Armiansky Pereulok, Moscow, U.S.S.R." That was the entry which at all times was on the register until it was removed by an application dated June 2, 1948, by Mr. Frederick Taylor, who gave notice that he, Frederick Taylor, of the Tass Agency, 85, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4 (it is to be observed that it had been previously registered as carrying on business at 115, Fleet Street), had ceased to carry on business on Aug. 31, 1946. Then there also appears to have been an application to register, which is dated Apr. 15, 1948, three weeks before the issue of THE SOVIET MONITOR in question, an entry made by one Michael Basharin, who stated that his business name was Tass, that the nature of his business was a news agency, that his place of business was 85, Fleet Street, that he was a Russian subject, and that he had commenced business, the date of commencement of business of the individual being Apr. 5, 1948. It will be observed that that is simply an entry of the business carried on by an individual without any statement that he was carrying it on as the agent of any foreign firm or principal. We were told that, although that application was dated Apr. 15, 1948, the actual entry in the register appeared to have been made on June 5. I think it is only right to assume—it is, in fact, no assumption—that the existence of the first entry in the register by Mr. Frederick Taylor had been brought to the notice of the defendants, if they did not know of it already, by means of an affidavit sworn by Mr. Frank James Linnell, which was filed on June 30, 1948, and that was in due course answered by an affidavit of Percy Charles Smith, sworn on Nov. 24, 1948, in which he exhibited a certificate by the ambassador dated Nov. 20, 1948, so that, when the ambassador's certificate was given, it was known to the defendants that there was this entry with regard to Frederick Taylor on the Business Names Register, and I should be very surprised, in view of the fact that no affidavit to the contrary has been put in, if they were not also well aware of the entry made by Mr. Basharin. However that may be, no explanation has been forthcoming with regard to those entries, nor has there been laid before this court any further evidence with regard to the status of this organisation in Russian law than is to be found from the statute creating this body, a translation of the complete statute having been put in in the present appeal by and on behalf of the plaintiff. Apart from the translation of the statute and apart from the ambassador's certificate and the affidavit of Mr. Andrienko, there is no material before this court calculated to assist us in determining the questions before us in so far as they are questions of Russian law.

That is a position which I regret. We gave to both parties an opportunity on the hearing of this appeal to adduce further evidence which might assist the court in determining this important question, but neither party was able, or, at any rate, willing, to adduce any further evidence on the matter, and, therefore, we have to do the best we can on the very scanty material before us. The result is that our decision in the present case can only be binding between the immediate parties thereto, and it may be possible, for all I know, that in some further proceedings, if there should, unfortunately, be such a further proceeding, further evidence may be forthcoming which may or might conceivably lead a court to come to a different conclusion. Our task is simply to deal with the matter on the evidence which the parties have thought fit to place before us. On that evidence we have the statement by the Russian ambassador that the Tass Agency constitutes a department of the Soviet State—that is the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—exercising the rights of a legal entity. There is nothing in the affidavit of Mr. Andrienko which assists the court in any way whatever. It merely consists of a summary of the effect of the statute creating the Tass Agency. In substance, in this case, apart from the entries in the Business Names Register, we have to deal with the matter on the ambassador's certificate, drawing our inferences to the best of our ability from looking at the translation of the statute.

The principal point made by counsel for the plaintiff is that the statement that Tass Agency constitutes a department of the Soviet State is contradicted or nullified or made ambiguous by the further statement that it exercises the rights of a legal entity. The first question is : Has counsel for the plaintiff established (and the onus is on him in this respect, having regard to the statement of the ambassador) on the material on which he has to work that by Russian law the Tass Agency is a separate legal entity ? I agree with Cohen, L.J., that he has not done so. There is nothing in the statute to say that it is a separate legal entity. The statute says in cl. 15 :

> " The telegraphic agency of the U.S.S.R. and the telegraphic agencies of the Union Republics enjoy all the rights of a juridical person " and the ambassador's certificate says (no doubt, summarising that clause) that it exercises the rights of a legal entity. There is not one word about it being subject to the obligations of a legal entity, nor is there any material to show what are the requisites in Soviet law of acquiring the status of a legal entity.

In this connection I should like to refer to a passage in the judgment of Atkin, L.J., in Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (4). There Atkin, L.J., was dealing with the position of the Air Council according to our law, and one of the questions which arose was whether or not the Air Council was a corporation. This is what Atkin, L.J., said ([1927] 2 K.B. 533) :

> " I have, therefore, felt it necessary to consider whether it could be contended in this case that the Air Council was a corporation. ' To create a corporation by charter or Act of Parliament it is not necessary that any particular form of words be used. It is sufficient if the intent to incorporate be evident ' : per Littledale, J., in Tone River Conservators v. Ash (8). The learned judge goes on to consider whether in the case of the conservators they have a name, perpetual succession, and a right to sue and be sued in their corporate name. It must be admitted that most, if not all, of these characteristics of a corporation attach to the Air Council. They have a name in which they can sue and be sued, and it would appear that they are to have perpetual succession, for by the Act of 1917, s. 8 (3), the property of the Air Board is to be transferred to them, and by s. 8 (4), it is contemplated that the property of the Admiralty or Secretary of State for War may be transferred to them by Order in Council. I find, however, that in fact under the Order in Council the property of the Secretary of State for War, and such property as the Air Council may acquire under the powers transferred to them, is vested not in the Air Council but in the President. I also bear in mind that there were in existence before 1917 various Acts expressly constituting departments of State corporations. I need only refer to the Acts incorporating > for certain purposes the Secretary of State in Council in India (Government of India Act, 1858, s. 65) ; the Postmaster-General (Post Office Duties Act, 1840, s. 67) ; and the Commissioners of Public Works (Commissioners of Works Act, 1892, s. 1). If it had been intended to incorporate the Air Council one would have expected the well known precedents to be followed with express words of incorporation, and express definition of the purposes for which the department was incorporated. In these circumstances I am unable as at present advised to find in the words of the legislature 'the manifest intention to incorporate' which LITTLEDALE, J., in the case cited rightly thought essential." A

Those are the considerations to which we should have to apply our minds if we were considering this matter under English law. No doubt, there are other similar considerations which may fall to be considered under Soviet B law for the purpose of deciding whether or not a separate status has been acquired. We do not know what the tests in Soviet law are with regard to this matter. All we know is that this organisation exercises, or has, the rights of a legal entity, or, putting it the other way, that it enjoys all the rights of a juridical person. Whether it may be sued, we do not know, nor, as I have said, do we know what are the essential requisites of a separate juridical C existence in Soviet law. Therefore, I think that these passages are not sufficient to establish the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that Tass had a separate legal existence.

I agree with COHEN, L.J., that, if that submission had been established, the plaintiff would not necessarily have succeeded in this appeal, and I should desire to reserve for future consideration the question whether or not the mere fact D of a separate legal existence is necessarily inconsistent with the entity being part and parcel of a sovereign independent state. There again, it must depend on the foreign law. It may be that under some foreign systems of law such a separate existence might be considered inconsistent, but it is clear from our Acts of Parliament that we do not consider the fact that a government department may have a separate legal juristic existence as necessarily E incompatible with it being a department of State for which immunity can be claimed.

I do not desire to add anything to what has fallen from COHEN, L.J., with regard to these entries in the Business Names Register. Although I should have been happier to have had some explanation of how they came to have been made, I cannot see that there is anything in them which would justify F this court in saying that it should not accept the statement of the ambassador that Tass Agency constitutes a department of the Soviet State, and that is the matter which is in dispute. That was the matter which was established in the United States Shipping Board case (1) by evidence of a very similar nature to that which appears in this certificate of the ambassador. Counsel for the plaintiff has expressly stated that he desires to reserve for argument G elsewhere, if he has the opportunity, the point that this immunity cannot be claimed for an organisation whose activities are other than governmental, but he recognises that he is precluded from arguing it here because of the decision in the Porto Alexandre case (2), following on The Parlement Belge (9), that the mere fact that trading activities are being pursued is not sufficient to deprive a government of its claim to immunity. I am bound to say, however, H that in the present case I do not know what the evidence is which shows that this agency was carrying on any activity inconsistent with its being a governmental activity, unless any assistance in that respect can be extracted from these entries in the Business Names Register. I agree that this appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. My judgment is strictly limited to the facts of this case. I do not think that we have before us all the facts necessary to enable us to form a clear view of the position, but we are asked to deal with the case as it stands. We are without any evidence as to Soviet law, except for (a) a translation of the statute concerning the Telegraph Agency of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and (b) the certificate of the ambassador, which is dated Nov. 10, 1948. It may well be that, if this question has to be considered at some future time, there will be further evidence and more light may be thrown upon the position.

The certificate of the ambassador states that the Tass Agency constitutes a department of the Soviet State. There is nothing to contradict that statement unless the words which follow, "exercising the rights of a legal entity," can be so read. I confess that I do not know what those words mean. They are not equivalent to saying that Tass is a legal entity. If they were, the position might be different. So far as I can see, there is no precedent for extending immunity to a corporate body carrying on business in this country, and I should wish for further argument before deciding that it could be so extended. The decision in the present case I regard as being based on a certificate of the ambassador that Tass is a department of the Soviet State.

Nearly thirty years ago there arose the case of The Porto Alexandre (2) to which my Lord referred. There it was decided that:

> "A vessel owned or requisitioned by a sovereign independent State and earning freight for the State, is not deprived of the privilege, decreed by international comity, of immunity from the process of arrest, by reason of the fact that she is being employed in ordinary trading voyages carrying cargoes for private individuals."

HILL, J., said he had arrived at that decision with the greatest reluctance. He added that on the facts he was prepared to find, if it was necessary, that the Porto Alexandre was being used in ordinary commerce, and that the only interest in the Portuguese government was in the earning of freight. In his view, the law as laid down in the Parlement Belge case (9) was that a sovereign State could not be impleaded either by being served in personam or indirectly by proceedings against its property; and if that were the principle it mattered not how the property was being employed. He continued ([1920] P. 31):

> "I think therefore that this motion succeeds upon the ground that it is established that this ship was the property of the Portuguese government at the time of arrest and is now its property. It therefore follows that so far as the ship and freight are concerned, the writ and all subsequent proceedings must be set aside, but the writ and all subsequent proceedings so far as the cargo is concerned, will remain good. I have already, in previous cases, pointed out what I conceive to be very strong reasons why it is undesirable that cases should be withdrawn, as this is being withdrawn, from the courts, but I have only to assert now what I conceive to be the law."

In the same case in this court BANKES, L.J., said (ibid., 34):

> "I gather from the judgment of HILL, J., and from what has been said by learned counsel, that this question is becoming one of growing importance. In the days when the early decisions were given, no doubt what were called government vessels were confined almost entirely, if not exclusively, to vessels of war. But in modern times sovereigns and sovereign States have taken to owning ships, which may to a still greater extent be employed as ordinary trading vessels engaged in ordinary trading. That fact of itself indicates the growing importance of the particular question, if vessels so employed are free from arrest."

SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 36):

> "Now this State and other States proceed in their jurisprudence on the assumption that sovereign States are equal and independent, and > that as a matter of international courtesy no one sovereign independent State will exercise any jurisdiction over the person of the sovereign or the property of any other sovereign State ; and now that sovereigns move about more freely than they used to, and do things which they used not to do, and now that States do things which they used not to do, the question arises whether there are any limits to the immunity which international courtesy gives as between sovereign independent States and their sovereigns. I think it has been well settled first of all as to the sovereign that there are no limits to the immunity which he enjoys."

And further (ibid., 38) :

> "I quite appreciate the difficulty and doubt which Hill, J., felt in this case, because no one can shut his eyes, now that the fashion of nationalisation is in the air, to the fact that many States are trading, or are about to trade, with ships belonging to themselves ; and if these national ships wander about without liabilities, many trading affairs will become difficult . . . These are matters to be dealt with by negotiations between governments, and not by governments exercising their power to interfere with the property of other States contrary to the principles of international courtesy which govern the relations between independent and sovereign States. While appreciating the difficulties which Hill, J., has felt, I think it is clear that we must, in this court, stand by the decision already given, and the appeal must be dismissed."

Those passages which I have read are of even greater importance today than they were when the words were spoken. That is why I have thought it right to draw attention to them, feeling sure, as I do, that this question will receive the attention which it deserves.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

REMNANT v. SAVOY ESTATE, LTD.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.), June 15, 16, 1949.]

Company—Debenture holder's action—Estoppel—Res judicata—Receiver appointed by court—Claim for furniture lent to company—Judgment against claimant—Claim by another claimant—Title of first claimant set up by receiver—Competence of defence.

Some years before 1940 Mrs. R. lent certain furniture to the S. Co. for its use. In 1940 a receiver was appointed by order of the court in a debenture holder's action against the company. In 1943 Mrs. R. took out a summons in that action asking for the delivery up to her of part of the furniture which was specified in an inventory, exhibit 4. In 1944 her claim was dismissed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that she had not established her title to the furniture as she had failed to prove that Sir C.F. (through whom she sought to prove her title) had given it to her. In 1945 she took out a second summons claiming the whole of the furniture, but, on being met with a defence of res judicata, she amended her summons by limiting her claim to items of furniture other than those contained in exhibit 4. On July 16, 1945, the personal representatives of Sir C.F. issued a summons in the action claiming the furniture contained in exhibit 4. The receiver and the debenture holder resisted this claim and set up the defence that the true owner of the furniture was Mrs. R. Both summonses were heard at the same time.

HELD : (i) the court must look on the matter as one in which the executors and Mrs. R. were between them claiming the furniture and the receiver and the debenture-holder were resisting that claim. Accordingly, as the latter relied on the defence that Mrs. R. was estopped from asserting a gift to her from Sir C.F., they were as much disabled as Mrs. R. from setting up this gift.

(ii) as bailee the receiver could not set up the jus tertii of Sir C.F. and afterwards, when his executors claimed the property, set up as a defence the title of Mrs. R. which he had previously repudiated as bailor.

(iii) as an officer of the court the receiver could not sever the two summonses claiming the property in such a manner as would permit him in the same proceedings to assert a fact against one claimant and to deny the other claimant's right to rely on the same fact.

APPEAL from a decision of VAISEY, J., by a receiver in a debenture holder's action and the debenture holder.

In 1940, in a debenture holder's action against Savoy Estate, Ltd., one E. L. Price was appointed receiver by order of the court. In September, 1943, the respondent, Mrs. O. F. Remnant took out a summons in that action, asking for the delivery up to her of certain furniture, then in store, described in an inventory, exhibit 4, which, she contended, had been lent by her to the company for use in an hotel owned by the company. In May, 1944, UTHWATT, J., gave judgment in her favour for the delivery up to her of the furniture. In October, 1944, that judgment was set aside by the Court of Appeal on the ground that Mrs. Remnant had not proved the gift of the furniture to her by Sir Charles Friswell, who had bought it in 1907. In March, 1945, Mrs. Remnant took out a second summons asking for the delivery up to her of furniture specified in both exhibit 4 and also in a further exhibit, exhibit 7, supporting her claim by the evidence previously tendered and a further affidavit asserting a gift of the furniture to her by Sir Charles Friswell. In July, 1945, EVERSHED, J., gave leave to amend the summons by restricting the claim to furniture which was not specified in exhibit 4 and which, therefore, had not been subject to the decision of the Court of Appeal. Subsequently, the executors of Sir Charles Friswell took out a summons claiming the property mentioned in exhibit 7 (which included that specified in exhibit 4). Both summonses were tried together. VAISEY, J., gave judgment for the executors, but he dismissed the claim of Mrs. Remnant. The receiver and debenture holder appealed. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and J. A. Reid for the appellants (the receiver and debenture holder).

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and Lindner for the respondents (the executors of Sir Charles Friswell).

The respondent, Mrs. Remnant, did not appear.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : The proceeding before the court is an appeal from an order of Vaisey, J., made on two summonses tried by him together in a debenture holder's action. The company concerned is the Savoy Estate, Ltd. The plaintiff in the action, E. S. Randall, is a debenture holder and the present appellants are Mr. Randall and a Mr. Lloyd Price, who was appointed by the court in March, 1940, as receiver of the undertaking of Savoy Estate, Ltd., comprised in the debentures. The respondents to the appeal, subject to the question of amendment of the notice of appeal, are three persons, namely, Mrs. Remnant, Lady Friswell, and Mr. Ashforth, the second and third respondents being the personal representatives of Sir Charles Friswell deceased. Those are the parties involved in the matter and they are before the court, not all being parties to the action, as persons who come into the proceedings by way of summons in a debenture holder's action.

The subject-matter in dispute is some furniture. Counsel for the appellants has conceded that we need not trouble with matters of identity. The furniture which is claimed in one or both of the summonses in question is comprised in exhibit 7. Whether or not all the items in exhibit 7 still exist does not matter, but part of those items are covered by another exhibit to which I will refer as exhibit 4. So far as I am aware, it is not in dispute that the items in exhibit 4 do exist. The whole of the furniture was the subject of certain transactions which took place between the first respondent, Mrs. Remnant, and her husband, now dead, on the one side, and Sir Charles Friswell, on the other. For present purposes it is sufficient to say that in 1907 this furniture was bought by Sir Charles Friswell. It is said that he gave it to Mrs. Remnant, and much has turned, during the nine years of litigation that has followed the appointment of the receiver, on the question whether that assertion is or is not, for some purposes or for all purposes, proved, but it appears to be established clearly that the furniture was lent by Mrs. Remnant, acting on whose behalf for the moment matters not, to Savoy Estate, Ltd., that it might be used by the company as part of the furnishings of an hotel called the Beresford Hotel, Birchington. The furniture having thus arrived at the hotel, misfortune appears to have fallen on the affairs of the company (which, I should interpolate, had been promoted by Mr. Remnant), and when the present proceedings began in 1940 the furniture was stored in a warehouse.

The first material matter to which I must allude is that at the end of 1943 Mrs. Remnant preferred a claim for the return to her of the smaller amount of furniture specified in exhibit 4, and the learned judge made an order for the delivery up of that furniture. The judge made the order on affidavit evidence by Mrs. Remnant, but the present appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal. They based their appeal on the ground that there was a lacuna in the evidence which Mrs. Remnant had put forward, because she had failed to establish the last link in the chain, namely, the gift from Sir Charles Friswell to herself, and that argument prevailed in the Court of Appeal. In view of some of the argument which has been put forward in this court, I must, I think, refer briefly to the judgments of Lord Greene, M.R., and Morton, L.J., given in that case. Lord Greene, M.R., began his judgment as follows :

> " I have no doubt whatever that Mrs. Remnant, in putting in a claim to this furniture, is acting in the perfectly honest belief that the furniture is hers. What the court has to consider is whether the evidence which she puts before the court in support of her claim is sufficient to establish it."

Then he deals with the case put before the court by Mrs. Remnant, and in the next paragraph he says :

> " She carries the matter as far as the sale to Sir Charles Friswell. All that the rest of her evidence amounts to is a suggestion that she regarded the furniture as her own. That is quite insufficient to establish a title based on a gift."

MORTON, L.J., said :

> " The applicant, however, wholly fails to make any such statement [that the gift was made] in her affidavit."

The basis of the decision of the court was that she had failed to prove her case.

That being the result of the appeal, Mrs. Remnant thought she would have a second attempt to make good her claim and issued another summons claiming the furniture. On July 11, 1945, that summons came before me, sitting as a judge of first instance, and the present appellants took the point that the matter had been determined and, according to the ordinary principles of res judicata, Mrs. Remnant could not litigate again the same question on which she had already been defeated. I took the view that Mrs. Remnant was estopped from litigating afresh her claim to the furniture against the same persons, but that that estoppel was limited to the subject-matter of her first claim, namely, the contents of exhibit 4, and if she were able to prove ownership of other items of furniture, that would be a wholly different cause of action and one which she could litigate. I, therefore, gave her liberty to amend her summons, which she did, and that summons thereafter became and has remained an application for delivery up to her of so much of the furniture in exhibit 7 as is not included in exhibit 4. When that claim came to be tried before VAISEY, J., he found that she had failed to identify any items of property constituting exhibit 7 minus exhibit 4 and on that ground he dismissed her application, but some five days after the summons had been before me there entered (perhaps to the surprise of the present appellants) two new characters into the litigation, namely, the personal representatives of Sir Charles Friswell, and on July 16, 1945, they issued a summons against the present appellants. They say in effect : " You, the receiver and the debenture holder, have managed to defeat Mrs. Remnant by persuading the Court of Appeal that she failed to prove a gift from Sir Charles Friswell to her. We represent Sir Charles Friswell and the furniture belongs to us." To that the present appellants made answer : " No. Against you we shall prove a gift by Sir Charles Friswell to Mrs. Remnant." At first sight that seems an almost Gilbertian situation. Here were the appellants, who had rebuffed A by saying she had established title in claimant B and was thereafter estopped from again asserting her own title, turning immediately afterwards to claimant B and saying : " We will now rebuff you by proving title in claimant A whom we have just disabled from making any effective claim against us."

As SOMERVELL, L.J., pointed out in the course of the argument, res judicata may work in mysterious ways and that may be the effect of the application of the doctrine here. I venture to think, however, that there is a relatively simple answer to the appellant's case. It will be observed—and this has been the basis of the argument of counsel for the appellants—that here there were two independent claims—(i) a claim by Sir Charles Friswell's personal representatives for furniture comprised in exhibit 4, and, (ii) a claim by Mrs. Remnant for furniture comprised in exhibit 7 minus exhibit 4, and that, in meeting those claims, there was no inconsistency in the receiver and the debenture holder saying : " On the facts, a gift is proved to her of everything. That, therefore, defeats the personal representatives and would entitle Mrs. Remnant to succeed if she could identify any furniture which answered the description of exhibit 7 minus exhibit 4." The two summonses, however, being summonses in the debenture holder's action, as a matter of convenience were dealt with together.

When they came on before VAISEY, J., it seems plain that there was no attempt to keep the two claims separate for the purpose of leading evidence or for argument. Counsel now appearing for the respondents appeared for all three persons and the same solicitors appeared for Mrs. Remnant and for the executors. It goes even further than that (and this is significant) for counsel for the respondents has made it plain that he is more than a co-applicant, he is an ally and champion, of Mrs. Remnant and appears in the proceedings with the benefit of her indemnity as to costs, and he has said that any furniture he recovers comprised in exhibit 4 he will immediately hand over to Mrs. Remnant.

When the facts are looked at and the matters to which I have referred borne in mind the real situation is that the severance of the claims disappears as an effective point in the case and the court must look on this matter as one in which there are, on the one side, three persons as claimants, claiming between them certain furniture, and, on the other side, the debenture holder and the receiver resisting that claim. True it is that the form of the summonses had limited the individual claimants to specific items, but the case was tried and the whole evidence was led on the footing that the whole of the claims were being dealt with together.

The importance of that seems to lie in the fact that the principle of res judicata, is, after all, a rule of evidence. In any proceedings between Mrs. Remnant, on the one hand, and the present appellants, on the other, if my judgment in July, 1945, was correct, both Mrs. Remnant and the appellants were estopped, if the point were relied on, from asserting a gift from Sir Charles Friswell to Mrs. Remnant so far as regarded the furniture specified in exhibit 4. That placed the appellants in a dilemma. If they chose to rely on the estoppel, they must themselves be affected by it. They were in the difficulty that in a proceeding relating to this furniture to which Mrs. Remnant was a party they themselves were as much disabled as Mrs. Remnant from setting up this point, and it may well be, if I appreciate the reasoning correctly, that it was on that ground that VAISEY, J., really decided the present case in favour of the respondents, because he made no finding in regard to the gift, but stated that the question whether there was a gift was one which he doubted could now be raised at all. Having so decided, he held that, the title being established in Sir Charles Friswell's executors, that was conclusive in their favour and that the furniture must be handed over to them. If, on the other hand, this matter of a gift was open—and it is clear, when one looks at the evidence, that it was treated as not only open but established or admitted for all purposes at the hearing—then the whole basis of the judgment which I gave in July, 1945, is destroyed, because here, in proceedings between these parties, the appellants, who had set up and were entitled to set up the estoppel, were themselves alleging this very point which they said Mrs. Remnant was estopped from asserting. I cannot help thinking that, if Mrs. Remnant had, at the hearing before VAISEY, J., sought to amend her summons or had even sought to appeal out of time against my judgment, she could have obtained leave and could have re-asserted jointly with the executors her claim to the exhibit 4 furniture. The matter could have been put in order in other ways. She could have abandoned her claim as donee. She could have assigned whatever rights she might have to the Friswell executors. Had she done that, the appellants would surely have been in a hopeless position in resisting their claim, but, as counsel for the appellants is entitled to say, those things did not happen and, as the matter now comes before the court, we have to treat the case as we find it stated on the summonses.

In my judgment, the answer to the claim is that in proceedings of this nature where the court must do justice to the best of its ability on the facts as proved the right answer is that arrived at by VAISEY, J., either on the ground he stated or on the ground that the substance of the matter is now that Sir Charles's executors, on their own behalf or on behalf of Mrs. Remnant, have established as against the debenture holder and the receiver a title to have this property delivered to them or as they shall direct. That conclusion is, I think, supported by certain other considerations. The first is this, and it has involved an interesting argument upon the question of bailment. To introduce that argument, I desire to refer to the statement which counsel for the appellants made in opening the case to this court of the matters of fact which he said should be treated as admitted and established and which he at least conceded. He put them in the form of questions and gave answers. These were his questions and these his answers : (i) : " Did this property originally belong to Mrs. Remnant and her husband ? (Answer) : I accept it that it did." (ii) : " Was it sold by Mr. and Mrs. Remnant to Sir Charles Friswell ? (Answer) : I accept it that it was." (iii) : " Was it given by Sir Charles Friswell to Mrs. Remnant ? (Answer) : I accept it that it was." (iv) (and this may be the most important in some respects) : " Did Mrs. Remnant lend the furniture to the company, Savoy Estate, Ltd., which had been established by Mr. Remnant ? (Answer) : I accept it that she did."

Counsel for the respondents has based his argument on that last point most forcibly, for he said the company and the persons now deriving title from the company are admittedly, and always were, bailees of this furniture. They had never attempted to establish any right or title of their own to the furniture. Being bailees, they could only defeat the title of their bailor, who, they say, was Mrs. Remnant, by setting up some title paramount in a third party. That was exactly, says counsel for the respondents, what they did in the Court of Appeal on the former occasion. They set up the jus tertii, and the tertius was Sir Charles Friswell. They could only do that (so runs the argument) with the authority, actual or assumed, of Sir Charles Friswell, and it must follow that there was, therefore, some kind of legal relationship established between Sir Charles Friswell and the appellants. They ought to be treated as having attorned bailees of Sir Charles Friswell, and they could not thereafter turn round and dispute the title of Sir Charles Friswell as bailor by setting up again another jus tertii, the tertia in this case being Mrs. Remnant whom they had previously repudiated as bailor.

For the proposition that the bailee, in order to resist the claim of the bailor, may only set up the right of a third party with the authority, actual or assumed, of the third party, counsel for the respondents relied on Rogers, Sons & Co. v. Lambert & Co. (1). I do not, however, find it necessary to pursue that matter. For my part, I think there may be great difficulty in the attornment point, but I think the respondents on this ground are in a stronger position when one considers the line taken before VAISEY, J., and this court. For, in resisting the claim of Sir Charles Friswell, who, on the evidence and on the admissions of counsel for the appellants, was the purchaser of this property, they are setting up the title of Mrs. Remnant. I think there is force in the respondents' argument that they did not really set up Sir Charles Friswell's title on the previous occasion in the Court of Appeal. I am inclined to think the bailment point, which might have been available to Mrs. Remnant, was not then put, at any rate in the forefront of her case, but, undoubtedly, in this court counsel for the appellants is setting up and is relying on the gift. That does seem to place him in somewhat of a difficulty. Either the title he seeks to set up is a good title, in which case he, a receiver, an officer of the court, is claiming to resist the respondents by setting up the title of somebody, in which case prima facie he, as an officer of the court, ought to hand it over to that somebody, or he is setting up—and this is really his case—a wholly fictitious title, because he is seeking to say in one and the same breath : " I rely on the gift to Mrs. Remnant, but at the same time, by virtue of the res judicata, I say it is a title which she could in no circumstances whatever effectively enforce against me." I am not satisfied that the latter is a possible line of argument to take—certainly not if it be right that the respondents are in the position of bailees quoad Sir Charles Friswell.

I have indicated the possibility that Mrs. Remnant might assign or abandon any claim which she might have to the exhibit 4 furniture, and I will just refer to a sentence quoted by LOPES, L.J., in Rogers' case (1) ([1891] 1 Q.B. 328) from a judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Biddle v. Bond (2). BLACKBURN, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, said (6 B. & S. 233) : A

> " We think that the true ground on which a bailee may set up the jus tertii is that indicated in Shelbury v. Scotsford (3), viz., that the estoppel ceases when the bailment on which it is founded is determined by what is equivalent to an eviction by title paramount. It is not enough that the bailee has become aware of the title of a third person. We agree with B what is said in Betteley v. Reed (4) that 'to allow a depositary of goods or money, who has acknowledged the title of one person, to set up the title of another who makes no claim or has abandoned all claim, would enable the depositary to keep for himself that to which he does not pretend to have any title in himself whatsoever '."

As SOMERVELL, L.J., pointed out, if you added to those words " who makes no C claim " " or who can make no claim," it would cover the facts of this case as counsel for the appellants says they must be taken to be between himself and Mrs. Remnant.

That does not decide the question, because is it right to say, between Sir Charles Friswell, on the one hand, and the appellants, on the other, that the latter were depositaries in the sense of being bailees of Sir Charles Friswell ? D I think that there are difficulties in that point. For my part, I prefer to leave it there and express no concluded opinion, because I come back now to the matter with which I started. We are, after all, dealing here with two parties, a debenture holder and a receiver. So far as the debenture holder is concerned, it seems to me that for the purposes of this case he rather drops out of the picture. The debenture holder has not got this furniture in his possession. E If the debenture holder is going to claim the furniture, he must prove title, and on a conflict of title he has failed to prove any title whatever in himself. The strength of the claim of counsel for the appellants is on behalf of the receiver who indubitably has got possession, and he is bound in the exercise of his duty to say : " Any claimant to this property in my possession must make good the claim." He is an officer of the court, and the position is that the F furniture is in the possession of the court through its officer, the receiver. I am far from suggesting that there is any impropriety in the attitude that the receiver in this case has taken. I think he has acted perfectly properly, in a very complicated and somewhat obscure matter, in resisting the claims that have been made, addressing to the court the arguments that have been addressed to us, and in putting the other parties to proof of their case, but he is an officer G of the court and, whether the passage that I have cited from Rogers v. Lambert (1) quite covers the case, at least it presents an analogy, and, in deciding this matter, we have got to consider what ought the officer of the court to do on the facts as they have emerged.

If the receiver can establish a title to this furniture in Mrs. Remnant, is he properly entitled, then, to retain it if he succeeds against her and to rely on H this estoppel ? For reasons that I have already stated, having regard to the way in which these matters have been tried, I do not think he can sever the case to an extent which would enable him at one moment to set up this matter of fact himself and in the next, in the same proceeding, to deny the right of another party to the proceeding to rely on the same fact. I think, therefore, that no sufficient answer was given to the question put by JENKINS, L.J. : If the appellants do succeed in setting up the title of Mrs. Remnant, how can the receiver retain the property ? On the other hand, if they cannot rely on it, either on the ground that it is not a title within the language I have cited from BLACKBURN, J., which they can properly set up against Sir Charles Friswell or because the estoppel works both ways in these proceedings—it is no more open to them than to Mrs. Remnant to set it up—then, it seems to me, the present respondents have made good their case, as VAISEY, J., thought, to have the furniture handed over to them or as they direct, which I understand clearly is to hand it to Mrs. Remnant.

There is one matter that I have left till last, and that is this. I have said that the two summonses were tried concurrently and really as one matter by VAISEY, J. His order was to the effect that Mrs. Remnant's claim failed for reasons, as I have already stated, of her failure to identify the furniture in question. He, therefore, dismissed her claim, save as regards certain matters of costs. I have not gone into that because Mrs. Remnant does not appeal and it has been unnecessary to do so, but in the notice of appeal as before the court when the case was opened Mrs. Remnant was a respondent to the appeal. The appellants were seeking to vary the order as regards Mrs. Remnant as to costs, which was the only matter of which they could complain. As regards the rest of the order which had directed the delivery to the respondents, they sought to have that reversed and that summons dismissed, but, on opening the appeal, counsel for the appellants made it plain that he did not desire to proceed against Mrs. Remnant, that he had so informed her and the other parties, and he asked leave formally to amend the notice of appeal by striking out Mrs. Remnant as a respondent and striking out from the relief he sought any matter relating to Mrs. Remnant. Counsel for the respondents has not objected, and Mrs. Remnant has not appeared in person or by counsel before us on the hearing of the appeal, but, strictly, the notice of appeal remains in its original form. I mention that, because I think it is desirable to have in mind that in a case of this sort the whole matter is before us and it is not right in a case of this kind to ignore the position of the various parties concerned, whether or not they are strictly before the court as parties to the appeal. I think, in the events which have happened, it would be better to allow the amendment and to have the record altered, because otherwise Mrs. Remnant would not have appeared though a party to the appeal, nor have appeared before the court, but it has been right that her name should be kept as a respondent during the hearing because in the administration of the assets in the hands of the receiver she is a person whose claim has obviously to be considered. Had it not been that counsel for the respondents has made it plain that he is really a champion of Mrs. Remnant, we might have taken a different view as to the propriety of making the amendment, but I think the amendment should be allowed in the form suggested, for the reasons I have stated.

It is unnecessary to express any view on the interesting points of law as to the extent of estoppels which might in other cases arise. On the facts of this case, the view taken by VAISEY, J., was right and the direction he gave for delivery of this furniture to the executors of Sir Charles Friswell or as they shall direct should stand and the appeal be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons which have been given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The issues in this appeal fall to be determined in the light of the circumstances which have been referred to, namely, the fact that these two summonses came on and were heard together. In agreeing with what has been said and in regarding this appeal as being disposed of on that basis, I want to make clear that I do not myself rely solely on those circumstances. I am not satisfied that what I may call the main argument put forward by counsel for the appellants would necessarily have succeeded if, for example, the same sort of problem had arisen in a second action at law. I will not trouble to detail the circumstances, which can easily be imagined, in which the same sort of problem might arise in a second action by a second claimant in respect of the goods which an original claimant in an earlier action had unsuccessfully claimed and against whom res judicata had been asserted. Whether the argument advanced on behalf of the appellants would succeed in that case or not, it is not necessary to consider, but I wanted to make it clear that I am not satisfied that it would. I agree with what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has said. I think there are some difficulties about the submission of counsel for the respondents about attornment. On the other hand, it might be that in such a case the principle that has been quoted from Biddle v. Bond (2) might by a comparatively minor extension be regarded as covering the issue.

JENKINS, L.J. : I also agree that this appeal fails. It is now admitted that the company never had any beneficial interest whatever in this furniture, which, consequently, was never subject to the charge constituted by the debentures. The furniture was in the possession of the company when the receiver was appointed and so passed into his custody. Now it has become clear that the furniture is not and never was the company's property and is not and never was subject to the charge, the sole question is : Who is the owner to whom the furniture should be handed over ? The only possible owner is either Sir Charles Friswell, now represented by his executors, he having admittedly purchased the furniture from Mrs. Remnant, or else Mrs. Remnant under the gift which she says was made of the furniture to her by Sir Charles Friswell after he had purchased it. The receiver has succeeded in defeating Mrs. Remnant's claim through her failure to adduce sufficient evidence to satisfy this court that the gift was ever made. The position, therefore, is that the receiver, holding as bailee these goods as goods which were merely lent to the company and having eliminated one claimant, must hold for the only other possible claimants, namely, Sir Charles Friswell's executors. The receiver, however, seeks to avoid that position by setting up against Sir Charles Friswell's executors the claim of Mrs. Remnant which he has already defeated. If that policy succeeded, the receiver would obtain for his debenture holders an accession to their security to which they had no right, for no secret is made of the fact that, having repelled the executors' claim in that way, the receiver would still insist on res judicata as between himself and Mrs. Remnant. I agree with the MASTER OF THE ROLLS that this position is wholly untenable. If the receiver relies on res judicata, as he is entitled to do, as barring Mrs. Remnant's claim against him, then, in my judgment, plainly that claim cannot be relied on as a defence against the executors' claim. The matter must be taken as res judicata for all purposes, and Mrs. Remnant's claim must be treated as dead for all purposes. If, on the other hand, the receiver is allowed to revive Mrs. Remnant's claim for the purpose of defeating the executors' claim, it must be resuscitated for all purposes, and the receiver, on successfully setting it up, must be taken to have set it up for the benefit of Mrs. Remnant. Of these two possible views, the learned judge took the former and held that in the circumstances Mrs. Remnant's claim must be treated as wholly gone and that the only possible claimants were the executors to whom he directed the furniture to be handed over. In my judgment, that conclusion was a perfectly proper one to come to in the peculiar circumstances of this case, and I agree that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

SMITH v. LONDON TRANSPORT EXECUTIVE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Jenkins, L.JJ.), June 30, July 1, 6, 1949.]

Street Traffic—Omnibus service—Powers of British Transport Commission—Delegation of powers to Transport Executive—Extent of powers and validity of delegation—Transport Act, 1947 (c. 49), ss. 2 (1) (3), 12 (1), 14 (4), 65 (1).

By the Transport Act, 1947, s. 1 (1), there was set up a public authority called the British Transport Commission with power, under s. 2 (1), inter alia, to carry goods and passengers by road within Great Britain. By s. 3 (1) the duty was imposed on the commission of providing or securing an efficient, adequate, economical and properly integrated system of public inland transport. Section 5 (1) provided that there should be public authorities, known as "executives," to assist the commission, and s. 5 (4) that each executive should, as agents for the commission, exercise such functions of the commission "as are for the time being delegated by the Minister" of Transport. As respects matters falling within the scope of any such delegation, by s. 5 (9) any rights, powers and liabilities of the commission should be treated as rights, powers and liabilities of the executive, and by s. 5 (10) every executive was to have power at the request of the commission to do, as agent for the commission, anything which the commission had power to do.

The defendants, the London Transport Executive, were an executive constituted under the Act of 1947. On Jan. 1, 1948, under s. 12 (1) of the Act and sched. III thereto, the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board vested in the commission, which, under s. 14 (2), had thenceforward all the rights and was subject to all the liabilities of the board. The board had been set up under the London Passenger Transport Act, 1933, with power to provide road services in specified areas. Section 15 of the Act of 1933 provided that the board was to have powers to provide road services of (inter alia) stage carriages on various roads, and that outside the London traffic area (the "special area") on roads within the London Passenger Transport Area the board could run services subject to the obligation to obtain a road service licence imposed by ss. 72 to 76 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, but to the extent that the services were kept within the special area the board was absolved from complying with the said ss. 72 to 76. Section 15 (1) also gave power to the board to provide services outside the London Passenger Transport Area subject to the restriction that it should not both pick up and set down passengers outside that area. Section 15 was repealed by the Act of 1947. Section 72 of the Act of 1930 provided: "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section the [Traffic] Commissioners may grant to any person applying therefor a licence . . . to provide such a road service as may be specified therein, and a vehicle shall not be used as a stage carriage . . . except under such a licence."

The plaintiff held a licence under s. 72 and ran a motor omnibus service between H. and W., which was not within the special area, but save for 400 yards was within the London Passenger Transport Area. The defendants began to run a service of omnibuses in competition with the plaintiff's service, and the plaintiff claimed an injunction restraining them from so doing or a declaration that in so doing they were acting ultra vires. Section 65 (1) of the Act of 1947 provides: "Sections 72 to 76 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 . . . shall not apply to any passenger road transport service provided, whether under a scheme under . . . this Act or otherwise, by the commission or by any person acting as agent for the commission, but neither the commission nor any such person as aforesaid shall use any public service vehicle for the conveyance of passengers for hire or reward at separate fares except—(a) on a route approved, as respects so much thereof as falls within any traffic area, by the licensing authority for public service vehicles for that area ; and (b) in accordance with such restrictions as may be imposed by that authority . . . " with regard to certain matters. Route approval under s. 65 had been secured by the defendants. The British Transport Commission in exercise of the powers conferred by s. 5 of the Act of 1947, made a scheme of delegation of functions which provided : A

"(1) . . . 'the executive' means the London Transport Executive . . . (2) This scheme applies to . . . (a) activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue of the transfer to them under pt. II of the Act [viz., ss. 12-14] of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board ; (b) activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue only of the powers conferred upon them by s. 2 (1) B of the Act so far as those activities are carried on in connection with the activities referred to in sub-para. (a) of this paragraph or are ancillary to such activities ; . . . (3) Subject to the provisions of this scheme, the commission hereby delegate to the executive the functions of the commission in relation to their activities set out in sub-paras. (a) and (b) of para. 2 of this scheme to the intent that . . . all the rights powers and liabilities C of the commission in connection with those activities shall be exercisable and dischargeable by the executive. . ."

HELD : (i) there was vested in the British Transport Commission under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1947 the necessary power to carry on the omnibus service between H. and W., and there was no ground for limiting the words "or otherwise" in s. 65 (1) of that Act so as to exclude therefrom the general D powers given by s. 2, or for treating the powers of the commission in relation to road passenger transport services in this particular case as comprising only the special powers in that regard under ss. 12 to 14 and ss. 63 to 65.

(ii) having regard to the repeal of s. 15 of the Act of 1933, the commission could not have run a service outside the London Passenger Transport Area by virtue of the transfer of the powers of the Transport Board, but it could do so E by virtue of its general powers under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1947, and, therefore, while the operation of the route from H. to W. was substantially within the powers of the commission referred to in para. 2 (a) of the scheme (such powers having been transferred from the board to the commission by virtue of s. 14 (4) of the Act of 1947), the 400 yards of the route outside the London Passenger Transport Area could only be operated under s. 2 (1), F but such operation was within para. 2 (b) of the scheme as being an activity carried on in connection with or ancillary to the activities referred to in para. 2 (a), and the powers were properly delegated to the defendants by para. 3.

Decision of VAISEY, J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 306), affirmed.

[FOR THE TRANSPORT ACT, 1947, ss. 2, 12, 14 and 65, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 40, pp. 926, 940, 941, 1234.] G

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of VAISEY, J., dated July 1, 1948, and reported [1948] 2 All E.R. 306.

The plaintiff brought this action to restrain the defendants, the London Transport Executive, from operating an omnibus service in competition with the plaintiff's service, or a declaration that such operation was ultra vires, with H consequential claims for damages and costs. VAISEY, J., dismissed the action, and the Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and G. R. F. Morris for the plaintiff.

Paull, K.C., Fox-Andrews, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the defendants, the London Transport Executive.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The question raised in this appeal concerns the right of the plaintiff and of the defendants, the London Transport Executive, to run a passenger omnibus service as stage carriages over a route in Hertfordshire between Hitchin and Weston. It is significant that, whereas by far the greater part of the route in question is within an area known as the London Passenger Transport Area, an area defined in the London Passenger Transport Act, 1933, a small part of it, about 400 yards in length, is outside that area.

The question on the appeal is the effect of the Transport Act, 1947, which so far as relevant came into operation on Jan. 1, 1948. It has been necessary to consider a number of sections in that Act, in the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and in the London Passenger Transport Act, 1933. Many of those sections are set out in full in the judgment of Vaisey, J., and in the circumstances I shall not read them again. I shall make only such references to parts of those Acts as are required to make this judgment intelligible. I must, however, say that, if the defendants are entitled to succeed, as Vaisey, J., held, and, as I think, rightly held, the result, is, undoubtedly, that the position of the plaintiff, an omnibus operator in a relatively small way of business, has been appreciably affected for the worse by the Act of 1947, while the position of the London Transport Executive is appreciably stronger than that of its statutory predecessor, the London Passenger Transport Board, in the area in question. That is, I think, the result of two words, namely " or otherwise " which are found in s. 65 (1) of the Act of 1947. That result, if I am right, I must, of course, assume to be deliberate, but the result is not one which I think would be expected from a cursory reading of the Act of 1947 and the arrangement of the sections in the Act, and I am not, therefore, for myself entirely surprised that the plaintiff has felt somewhat aggrieved.

He has for many years operated an omnibus route for stage carriages over this road on three days during the week. In March, 1947, the London Passenger Transport Board applied for a road service licence under s. 72 of the Act of 1930 for running an omnibus service over this same road. That application they were then bound to make. Anybody who wanted to run an omnibus route over this section of the country was bound to get a road service licence under the Act of 1930. The plaintiff opposed the application, as he was entitled to do, and the application was still pending when the Act of 1947 came into operation. By virtue of that Act the defendants, as successors of the London Passenger Transport Board, claim that they are now entitled to operate the omnibus service in question without complying with the formalities of s. 72 of the Act of 1930, provided only that they get a " route approval " from the licensing authority, an individual who is himself the successor of the old traffic commissioner. That route approval they obtained, and they, therefore, started running their omnibuses over this route in February, 1948. The question is : Are they entitled to do so ?

The Act of 1947 is the Act which, according to popular language " nationalised " the railways and also brought certain other transport undertakings and services under public control. Section 1 (1) of the Act created a public authority known as the British Transport Commission, which was the controlling authority responsible for the various public transport services by rail, road and water in Great Britain covered by the Act. For the purpose of the carrying out of the duties imposed on the commission, the Act also created or provided for the creation of a number of subordinate public authorities, and one of those subordinate public authorities is the London Transport Executive, the defendants. Speaking broadly, I think there can be no doubt that the London Transport Executive was intended to be the successor for practical purposes of the old London Passenger Transport Board in the area covered by the activities of the board. The scheme of the Act, in the case of those subordinate authorities, was that the Transport Commission should delegate in a form and manner prescribed so much of the commission's powers as was requisite to enable the subordinate authorities to carry on the delegated activities. Such an instrument of delegation in favour of the London Transport Executive has been executed, and the defendants are the London Transport Executive alone, the British Transport Commission not having been joined.

The questions, therefore, raised in the action were two-fold. First, were A the powers conferred by the Act on the British Transport Commission sufficient to enable them to do what the London Transport Executive has done, that is, operate on this route as stage carriages the omnibus service which I have described in opposition to the plaintiff merely on getting route approval, and without the obligation previously necessary of obtaining a road service licence ? The second question is, assuming that the British Transport Commission was B invested with the necessary powers, were those powers effectively delegated to the London Transport Executive by the commission by the instrument of delegation which I mentioned ?

As to the first question, I think that the answer is plainly yes. I think it is sufficient to look at s. 2 of the Act of 1947, which has been fairly described as being, so to speak, the charter or memorandum of association of the new C British Transport Commission. It provides :

> "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the commission shall have power (a) to carry goods and passengers by rail, road and inland waterway, within Great Britain."

Further subsections were read, including sub-s. (3), which also appears to D give to the commission wide general powers for carrying on, among other things, omnibus undertakings. In connection with that it is, I think, useful to refer at once to s. 65 (1) which is in these terms :

> "Sections 72 to 76 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 (which relate to road service licences) shall not apply to any passenger road transport service E provided, whether under a scheme under the preceding provisions of this Part of this Act or otherwise, by the commission. . ."

It was suggested in argument that the words "or otherwise" should be in some way limited. The reference to a "scheme under the preceding provisions" of the Act is a reference to the power given to the authorities created under the Act to obtain in the form and by the manner stated a scheme for the running F of transport services over a specific area. There is no question in this case that the provisions of those sections, ss. 63 and 64, have not been invoked, but I have been unable to see a good reason for limiting the words "or otherwise" so as to exclude any powers under which the Transport Commission could carry on or, to use the language of the section, provide a passenger road transport service including the general powers under s. 2. G

A further argument which counsel for the plaintiff pressed on us was to the effect that when regard is had to the circumstances with which we are concerned, namely, the transfer under certain other sections of the Act of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board, then, on a true reading of the Act, the only powers which the commission should be treated as having quoad that transferred undertaking are the powers which by the transfer provisions, in H this case s. 14, are expressly vested in the commission as transferee. Counsel bases his argument first on the opening words of s. 2 which are "Subject to the provisions of this Act," and also on his analysis of the Act as a whole. I hope that he will excuse my not following him in detail through the whole Act, but the effect of it, he says, briefly is this. Part II of the Act covers railways, canals and other undertakings which are taken over by the express terms of the sections in that part. Part III refers to the special case of road haulage, with which we are not concerned here. Then pt. IV includes ss. 63, 64 and 65, which are directly related to passenger road transport services. Later in pt. IV there are provisions as regards ports, and again provision is made for them by way of schemes, and, finally, there are provisions in s. 70 et seq. in regard to coastal shipping where provision is made for working agreements covering that particular activity. Counsel for the plaintiff says that, on the true construction A of the Act and looking at it as a whole, the scheme of it is that in the present case one ought to treat the powers of the commission, not as being the general ones under s. 2, but as being the special ones provided in ss. 12 to 14 as regards transferred undertakings and ss. 63 to 65 which relate exclusively to road passenger transport services. But, as I have indicated, I have come to the conclusion that it is not possible as a matter of construction to give such a very B limiting effect to these opening words, " Subject to the provisions of this Act," and I think, therefore, that it is on that view reasonably clear that there is vested under those general provisions in the commission the necessary powers to carry on this particular road omnibus service.

I would add by way of support to that (and the force of the point was conceded by counsel for the plaintiff) that the fasciculus of sections with regard to coastal C shipping opens with the words, " Without prejudice to any powers possessed by the commission apart from the provisions of this section," indicating clearly as regards coastal shipping that the powers of the commission are not limited to the powers to make working agreements which are specifically referred to in those sections. I think, however, and this is, perhaps, of some importance, that the commission's powers are not only those general powers conferred by s. 2, D but include also the special powers which are vested in the commission by virtue, e.g., of the transfer sections, ss. 12 to 14. I shall have to refer to those sections in a moment, but it follows, if I am right, that there are both the general and the special powers conferred on the commission. To some extent, no doubt, there is duplication.

I now come to the question which I have found more difficult and that E is the question what was the effect of the instrument of delegation ? The document was executed on Dec. 5, 1947, to come into operation on Jan. 1, 1948. Before I refer to its terms I should, I think, allude a little more specifically to ss. 12 and 14 of the Act, both of which sections are in pt. II thereof. Section 12 provides :

> " (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, the whole of the undertakings F of the bodies of persons specified in sched. III to this Act [including the London Passenger Transport Board] . . . shall, on Jan. 1, 1948 . . . vest by virtue of this Act in the commission."

Section 14 provides :

> " (1) The provisions of this section shall, subject to the other provisions G of this Act, have effect where, under the preceding provisions of this Part of this Act, the whole of the undertaking of any body is to vest in the commission.

Sub-section (2) provides that the property of the board shall pass and become the property of the commission. I do not propose to go all through those details, but sub-s. (3) has for present purposes the effect that where there are H agreements or like instruments to which the London Passenger Transport Board is a party, thenceforth those agreements and instruments must be read as though the party had been the British Transport Commission instead of the London Passenger Transport Board. Sub-section (4) provides :

> " The provisions of the last preceding sub-section . . . shall apply in relation to any statutory provision, and any provision of any agreement to which the body were not a party, any provision of any . . . document not being an agreement, as they apply in relation to an agreement to > which the body [the London Passenger Transport Board] were a party, and, in relation to any such statutory or other provision as aforesaid . . . The statutory or other provisions to which this sub-section applies include statutory or other provisions passed or made after the passing of this Act but before the date of transfer."

I read that sub-section, again expressing it quite briefly, as having the effect that the statutory powers which the London Passenger Transport Board had by the express terms of the Act of 1933 passed to and became vested in the British Transport Commission, so that they have the statutory powers defined in the Act of 1933 just as the London Passenger Transport Board used to have them.

Sub-section (6) of s. 14 was referred to in argument, and it is convenient to mention it now. That provides that > "Notwithstanding anything in this section . . . (c) the commission shall not, by reason of the vesting, have any rights or powers of the body as respects the borrowing of money or the raising of money by the issue of securities, and the provisions of sub-ss. (3) and (4) of this section shall not apply to agreements, statutory provisions or documents" in relation to borrowing money. It was said that the terms of that sub-section indicate that the general powers of the old board should be treated as vesting automatically by virtue of s. 12 rather than by the effect of sub-s. (4) of s. 14, but I do not myself read that paragraph as indicating such a result. Under the Act of 1933 there were special borrowing powers which the London Passenger Transport Board had. It was obviously necessary that those should be preserved so long as the London Passenger Transport Board was alive as otherwise it might have been said that the borrowings had become ultra vires. I treat this paragraph, therefore, as indicating that the provisions I have read of s. 14 (4), which transferred, so to speak, the special powers of the board to the commission, do not confer on the commission the borrowing powers which the Transport Board had. I think that it is true to say, as counsel for the plaintiff said, that the mere vesting of the undertaking by s. 12 (1) would not itself carry the statutory powers, but that it is necessary to refer to s. 14 (4) to get that result as an effect of the vesting. The side note is, perhaps, of interest on that view, for it states: "General effect of vesting of undertakings." I think counsel for the plaintiff was right when he pointed out that there is in s. 12 no express reference to powers, whereas in other sections of the Act dealing with the acquisition of undertakings you do find express reference to the powers of the undertakings transferred, so that, whether or not in the absence of any other context the vesting of the undertaking would automatically vest the powers, in this case, my opinion is that the special powers vest and vest only by virtue of s. 14.

That raises the question, what were the powers? They were numerous and contained, as I have said, in the Act of 1933. I refer very briefly to four of those sections. Section 3 contained what is described as the general duty of the board as to passenger transport, and stated that it was its general duty to provide an adequate and properly co-ordinated system of passenger transport within the London Passenger Transport Area. Sub-section (3) gives, so to speak, general "charter" powers to the board, and the first of them was:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the board may in the exercise of their duty . . . (a) maintain, manage, carry on, extend and improve their undertaking."

Section 5 sets out, by reference largely to schedules, what were the existing undertakings which were taken over by the London Passenger Transport Board. They included very large numbers of omnibus undertakings (among other things), operating in various parts of London, including, of course, metropolitan London itself, but also extending to other parts of the London Passenger

Transport Area. Section 15 of the Act of 1933 is of great importance. I must refer to that a little more in detail, because, as counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, no reference is made by the learned judge in his judgment to this section or, what is more important, to the fact that it was repealed by the Act of 1947. Section 15 provided that the board was to have powers to provide road services of stage carriages (among other things) on various roads, and it provided, first, that outside what was called the special area, the London traffic area, on roads within the London Passenger Transport Area the board could run these services subject to the obligation imposed by ss. 72 to 76 of the Act of 1930, but so long as and to the extent that they kept within the special area entirely they were absolved from getting a road service licence. That is the effect of s. 15 (3), which says that ss. 72 to 76 shall not apply to a road service provided by the board wholly within such portion of the London Passenger Transport Area as lies within the London traffic area,

> " . . . and in the case of a road service provided by the board partly within and partly without the special area shall not apply to that service in so far as it is within the special area."

That sub-section had the effect, therefore, of relieving the London Passenger Transport Board from obligations which would otherwise have applied to them (albeit they were acting under their general powers) by virtue of the Act of 1930. The section also went further, because it gave the board power to go outside the London Passenger Transport Area altogether, but (so far as relevant to this case) subject to a certain restriction, to wit, that they should not both pick up and set down passengers outside the area. So far as this case is concerned, it was necessary, because the service in question was not one which was wholly within the area to which the exemption applied, for the board to ask for a road service licence, and, though it was intra vires the board to run their omnibuses (if they got their licence) over the 400 yards outside the London Passenger Transport Area, it was also as a result of this section impossible for the board both to pick up and set down on the 400 yards. Nevertheless, and I emphasise this because I shall come back to it in a moment, I think there is no doubt on its fair construction that s. 15 was not a mere limiting section, but was an enabling section that gave to the board powers which by virtue of the general terms they would not otherwise have had, powers to do things free from restrictions which would otherwise have applied, or powers to do things which they could not otherwise do at all, albeit subject to the special restrictions specified in the section.

Section 16 gave to the board within the London traffic area, in effect, a monopoly. As I say, there were very many other powers of all kinds to which reference was made, but those I think will be sufficient to illustrate the point that I now want to deal with, which arises from the fact that by virtue of s. 128 of the Act of 1947 a number of sections or sub-sections of the Act of 1933 were repealed, and included among the repeals were all the sub-sections of s. 3, except sub-s. (3), and s. 15. The effect of those repeals, as I construe the Act of 1947, was that the powers which went over to the commission by virtue of s. 14 (4) were the residuary powers which the board had under the Act of 1933 as amended by the repeals. For practical purposes I take that as having the effect, so far as this case is concerned, that the special powers of the board which went over to the commission were such that the commission could not by virtue of these powers have run an omnibus service at all over the 400 yards which lies outside the London Passenger Transport Area, because I take it that the only power they could have found under the Act of 1933 to do so would have been in s. 15 which has been repealed. That still left the general power to run omnibuses within the London Passenger Transport Area. I take the statement which I have just made to be the effect of the repeals on the powers under the Act of 1933 as transferred to or vested in the commission by virtue of s. 14 (4). Among those powers there were left, as I have indicated (and they must have been left for some purpose), s. 3 (3) (which gives the general right to run omnibuses within, as I construe it, the London Passenger Transport Area), s. 5 (which described the undertaking of the board which goes over to the commission), and s. 16 (which left to be transferred the monopoly position of the London Passenger Transport Board).

I now refer to the instrument of delegation, and parts of two paragraphs in it only need be read. The first is para. 2, and, as Jenkins, L.J., pointed out during the course of the argument, that really is a recital. It defines what it is to which this scheme of delegation applies, and it says :

> " This scheme applies to the following activities of the commission : (a) activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue of the transfer to them under pt. II of the Act of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board ; (b) activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue only of the powers conferred upon them by s. 2 (1) of the Act so far as those activities are carried on in connection with the activities referred to in sub-para. (a) of this paragraph or are ancillary thereto."

Sub-paragraph (a) refers plainly to ss. 12 and 14 of the Act of 1947. The words " by virtue only " in sub-para. (b) show that what that sub-paragraph is referring to is powers which will not go over to the commission by virtue of ss. 12 and 14—powers, that is, which the commission cannot show they derive from those sections, but which are conferred only by virtue of the general provisions of s. 2. The operative para. 3 is as follows :

> " Subject to the provisions of this scheme the commission hereby delegate to the executive [the defendants] the functions of the commission in relation to their activities as set out in sub-paras. (a) and (b) of para. 2."

There follow some other words to which I will refer in a moment. Now, translating for this purpose the language of para. 2 (a) of the scheme, the question seems to me to be whether the operation of this omnibus route with which we are concerned is wholly or substantially something which the commission is empowered to do by virtue of the transfer to it of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board. I think the answer is substantially, yes. I give that answer because as I construe s. 14 (4) of the Act of 1947, together with the amended Act of 1933, the effect of the transfer of the board's undertaking was to give to the commission the statutory powers of the board to carry on their undertaking—to carry on, maintain and extend it (to use the words of s. 3 (3)) within the London Transport Area.

Counsel for the defendants has argued that the effect of the repeal is to remove all the limitations which previously affected the London Passenger Transport Board, so that the commission, as successors of the board, as the board could itself have done if there had been no vesting, can by virtue of the powers under the Act of 1933, as they now are, carry on their operations anywhere in Great Britain. I reject that argument. It rests, as I follow it, on the view that all the sections or sub-sections of the Act of 1933 which were repealed, including s. 15, were purely limiting sections. I do not take that view. Particularly, as I construe it, s. 15 was not a limiting section but an enabling section. It gave the Passenger Transport Board certain powers within the area free from restrictions which might otherwise have applied to it, and powers subject to the restrictions specified in the Act outside the London Passenger Transport Area altogether. It might, I think, be possible to go further and say that the activities referred to in para. 2 (a) of the scheme are all the activities, that is all the functions and operations, which in the exercise of the general powers conferred on the commission by the Act of 1947 the commission can perform in reference to the undertaking, including the omnibus undertaking acquired from the London Passenger Transport Board. That construction would cover all operations over the whole of the road in question (inter alia), because such operations were in truth contemplated by s. 15 of the Act of 1933, albeit subject to restrictions, and the powers of s. 15 are for this purpose, it is said, preserved by s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1947. On that view it would, I think, be unnecessary for the defendants to rely on s. 14 of the Act of 1947 at all, and it would be A immaterial that s. 15 was in fact repealed. On that view the repeal of s. 15 was necessitated or justified as a drafting matter so as to avoid conflict between the power which would have been expressly vested under s. 14 and the general powers of the commission under the Act of 1947. It may well be that this view of the effect of the Act was the view in the minds of the parties to the instrument of delegation having regard to the latter words in para. 3 which are :

> B "To the intent that, subject as aforesaid, all the rights, powers and liabilities of the commission in connection with those activities shall be exercisable and dischargeable by the executive."

For my part, however, I prefer to rely on the argument which I have tried earlier to express, that is that there was by virtue of s. 14 (4) of the Act of 1947 a transfer to the commission of all the general statutory powers to carry on,
C inter alia, their omnibus activities within the London Passenger Transport Area, which the London Passenger Transport Board had under the terms of the Act of 1933 as amended by the repeals, these general powers being, of course, subject to the general provisions of the Act of 1947, including particularly s. 65 of that Act.

If the view which I have expressed is right, then it would be true to say that
D the commission are empowered to carry on the operation of an omnibus route over the whole of the road in question save only the 400 yards or so which lie outside the London Passenger Transport Area, and that is because they have that power as the statutory effect of the transfer to the commission under pt. II of the Act of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board. As to the 400 yards to which I have alluded it is, to my mind, reasonably clear that in the E circumstances the operation of the omnibuses over those 400 yards is properly to be described as an activity carried on in connection with the main activity which I have already described as falling within para. 2 (a) of the scheme or ancillary to such activity. It is an operation, moreover, which the commission would be empowered to carry on, not by virtue of any transfer of the London Passenger Transport Board's powers, but only by virtue of the general
F powers of the commission under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1947. As to the last point counsel for the plaintiff urged that there was no evidence which would entitle the court to say that the 400 yards operations were, properly speaking, in connection with or ancillary to the main operation of the omnibus route. On the particular facts of this case, however, I cannot accept that argument. I think they plainly were.

G For those reasons, which I think are the same as those which influenced the learned judge, I come to the conclusion that the appeal fails. I have, I am afraid, stated it at rather greater length, but I have been concerned particularly to deal with the argument that counsel for the plaintiff addressed to us based on the repeal of s. 15 of the Act of 1933, and because it did not appear from the judgment of VAISEY, J., that he had considered it. No doubt he had, but,
H in fact, it was not referred to in his judgment. But I agree with the view he took, and the appeal, in my judgment, fails.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that the appeal fails and for the reasons which have been given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, and I only wish to add very few words with regard to the repeal of s. 15 of the London Passenger Transport Act, 1933, and the effect of that repeal, if any, on the construction of the words in para. 2 (a) of the instrument of delegation. The general scheme of this legislation in the light of the provisions, to which reference has already been made, as from Jan. 1, 1948, when the Act came into force, seems to me to be that in the Act of 1947 general powers are conferred, some of which have been referred to, and there are restrictions and other administrative provisions which apply to the British Transport Commission as a new body set up under that Act. There also remain on the Statute Book the acts (in cases where there were Acts) which set up and provided for a number of undertakings including that of the London Passenger Transport Board which were vested in the Transport Commission under pt. II of the Transport Act, 1947. In reading those Acts, by reason of s. 14 (4), the British Transport Commission's name is substituted for that of the undertaking. In dealing, therefore, with matters which arise after the scheme has come into operation there is the main Act to look at and also what is unrepealed of the special Act dealing with the transferred undertaking.

In considering the effect of a repeal of a section it is necessary to consider the nature of what is repealed. Let me give a simple example. Suppose one of the undertakings to be transferred had under its statute a power to engage in some activity, and assume that it had not already exercised the power, but it had it and could exercise it at any time, and that that power was not covered by s. 2 or by the general powers conferred on the British Transport Commission under the Act of 1947. If the section conferring that power was repealed, it would, of course, be plain that Parliament did not intend the British Transport Commission to have the power which the transferred undertaking previously had to engage in that activity. When one considers the repeal of s. 15, having regard to what my Lord has already stressed and emphasised—the fact that s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1933 has been left unrepealed—the position, it seems to me, is quite different.

The effect of s. 14 (4) of the Act of 1947 is to write in the British Transport Commission in the Act of 1933 in the places in the Act where you find references to the board. If s. 15 (1) had been left unrepealed one would have had this provision : " Subject to the provisions of this section it shall be lawful for the British Transport Commission to provide road services of stage and express carriages on any of the following roads, but not otherwise." At once there would have been a conflict because there would be something on the statute book purporting to say that the British Transport Commission was restricted to the London Passenger Transport Area and to such extensions of it as are covered by that section, whereas the Act of 1947 gives it powers over the whole country. When you come to s. 15 (3), the references to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, ss. 72 to 76, as they are there applied to the board would be, as I read it, in conflict with s. 65 (1) of the Transport Act of 1947. It seems to me, therefore, that the problem that confronted the draughtsman was that s. 15 had become inapplicable because, in so far as it conferred powers—and it did confer powers—they already existed under the general powers conferred by the Transport Act, and, in so far as it imposed restrictions, they were inapplicable as applied to the British Transport Commission as a whole, and, therefore, in the matter of drafting it seems clear that s. 15 had to go, but the fact that, as a matter of drafting, the position had to be arranged in that way does not, in my view, having regard to the fact that s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1933 was left on the statute book, in any way cut down the construction which ought to be given to the words that have been read in para. 2 (a) of the scheme of delegation. The activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue of the transfer to them of the undertakings under pt. II of the Act of 1947 seem to me to be the activities which were previously carried on by the London Passenger Transport Board, and, in my view, the scope of those words is not cut down by the fact that for obvious drafting reasons the powers which the London Passenger Transport Board had is merged in the greater power which the British Transport Commission has. For those reasons, as well as those which my Lord has given, I agree that the appeal fails.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree. If literal justification is needed for the reference in the scheme of delegation to activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue of the transfer to them under pt. II of the Act of 1947 of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board, for my part I think that such literal justification is to be found—though I may be alone in so thinking—in s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1947, which provides:

A
> "Where, whether by agreement or otherwise, the commission acquire the whole or any part of any undertaking of any other person, they may, subject to the provisions of this Act, carry on any activities, whether mentioned in sub-s. (1) of this section or not, which were theretofore carried on for the purposes of that undertaking or part of an undertaking or were authorised by any statutory provision to be carried on for the purposes thereof."

B

It was argued by counsel for the plaintiff that that sub-section had no application to undertakings acquired under the provisions of pt. II of the Act itself, but was directed to cases of separate acquisitions which might thereafter take place. For my part, I see no ground for so limiting the operation of the sub-section, and if it applies, as I think it does, to one of the undertakings transferred under pt. II, C as, for example, the London Passenger Transport Board, then it seems to me to follow that literally the Act did empower the commission to carry on any activities which the London Passenger Transport Board was authorised to carry on for the purposes of its undertaking by virtue of the transfer to the commission of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board.

I do not, however, feel it is necessary in this case to search the Act for precise D verbal justification for the form of words used in the scheme of delegation. It is not open to doubt that the commission, among many other powers, have power at all events to carry on all the activities which the London Passenger Transport Board could have carried on prior to the transfer, subject to various qualifications and exceptions which are not material for the present purpose; and the activities which the London Passenger Transport Board could have E carried on undoubtedly included the running of a passenger service between Weston and Hitchin, subject, so far as the London Passenger Transport Board was concerned, to the necessity for getting a licence under the Act of 1930 in respect of the portion of the route outside the London Passenger Transport Area, and subject also to the qualification or restriction in s. 15 (1) of the Act of 1933 to the effect that they could not both pick up and set down a passenger F on that part of the route. The commission are in a better position than the London Passenger Transport Board in that the commission are absolved by s. 65 (1) of the Act of 1947 from any necessity to obtain a licence and are also free from any restriction as to picking up and setting down by virtue of the repeal of s. 15 of the Act of 1933 and of the general power given by s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act of 1947 of carrying passengers by road within Great Britain. So one finds G the position that the commission have transferred to them the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board, amongst a great many other undertakings, and that they have full power to carry on the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board, and all the powers necessary to enable them to do everything the London Passenger Transport Board could have done. The whole aim and object of the Act, when one looks at it, is to enable the central H authority which is set up to carry on the acquired undertakings as heretofore and to extend them.

Looking at the scheme of delegation against that background, one finds that the commission, having powers such as I have described, and having admittedly power to delegate their functions, purport to delegate certain of their functions which they define as functions in relation to activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue of the transfer to them under pt. II of the Act of the undertaking of the London Passenger Transport Board. I should have thought it reasonably plain that the intention of the scheme of delegation was to give the new London Transport Executive power to do everything within the powers of the commission themselves which the old London Passenger Transport Board had power to do before the transfer. That I think is, no doubt, what was intended, but the plaintiff's argument is in effect that, if one puts a strict literal construction on the formula used in the scheme to define the activities in question and then goes to the Act with that strict literal construction in mind, one finds that the scheme of delegation is a mere nullity, a brutum fulmen, because there are no such activities of the commission as are described in the scheme of delegation. Apart from s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1947 and the other answers to this argument stated by my Lords, I think it involves a wrong method of approach, for this case, in the last resort, once the question of ultra vires is out of the way, turns on the true construction of the scheme of delegation read in conjunction with the Act. The scheme must be applied to the Act and the court must see whether, looking at the Act, the language used in the scheme sufficiently identifies the particular activities to which the delegation is intended to relate. Of course, if, having gone through the Act, the court found it impossible to identify the activities meant, then the result might be that the scheme failed, but that would happen or ought to happen only if identification is impossible.

Looking at the Act as a whole, I find it reasonably plain that the activities to which it was intended to refer in the scheme of delegation were the activities which the old London Passenger Transport Board had power to carry on before the transfer, and that for the purposes of the scheme the commission's powers to carry on these activities are treated—and quite reasonably treated, in my judgment—as powers derived by the commission from the old London Passenger Transport Board, the activities in question being, accordingly, described as activities which the commission are empowered to carry on by virtue of the transfer. I find no difficulty as a matter of construction, reading the scheme and the Act together, in identifying the activities referred to in the scheme in the way I have stated. The result of that is, I think, having regard not only to para. 2 (a) but also to para. 2 (b) of the scheme, that the powers delegated by the scheme include power to run a passenger transport service on the route between Weston and Hitchin, including, I think, by virtue of para. 2 (b), power both to pick up and set down passengers on that part of the route outside the London Passenger Transport Area.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

BRADDOCK v. TILLOTSONS NEWSPAPERS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Singleton, L.JJ.), June 20, 21, 22, 1949.]

Appeal—Evidence—Further evidence—Power of Court of Appeal to receive—Credit—Application for leave to recall witness for cross-examination as to credit—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4.

By R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4: "The Court of Appeal shall have all the powers and duties as to amendment and otherwise of the High Court, together with full discretionary power to receive further evidence upon questions of fact . . . Such further evidence may be given without special leave upon interlocutory applications, or in any case as to matters which have occurred after the date of the decision from which the appeal is brought. Upon appeals from a judgment after trial or hearing of any cause or matter upon the merits, such further evidence (save as to matters subsequent as aforesaid) shall be admitted on special grounds only, and not without special leave of the court."

A plaintiff, who was appealing from the verdict of a jury dismissing her claim for damages for alleged libel in a newspaper, applied to the Court of Appeal, under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, for leave to recall one of the witnesses for the defendants for cross-examination as to credit, on the ground that, after the conclusion of the trial, her solicitor had been informed that this witness had been convicted on several occasions between 1935 and 1948 of offences involving dishonesty.

HELD : it had been the invariable practice of the Court of Appeal to confine the admission of further evidence on questions of fact under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, to evidence on questions of fact material to an issue in the action ; assuming that the court had power to order the recall of a witness for the purpose of his being cross-examined as to credit, that power should be exercised sparingly and only where the evidence was of such a nature, and the circumstances of the case were such, that no reasonable jury could be expected to act on the evidence of the witness whose character had been called in question ; it was impossible to say that that was established in this case ; and, therefore, the application to adduce further evidence must be dismissed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., sitting with a special jury, made on Nov. 11, 1948.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Elizabeth Margaret Braddock, a member of Parliament, claimed damages for an alleged libel in a newspaper of which the defendants were the proprietors, printers and publishers. The article complained of commented on an incident in the House of Commons, stating inter alia that the plaintiff "danced a jig on the floor of the House." The defence was a plea of fair comment. At the trial it was admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that the comment complained of at the end of the article in question would have been fair, if the facts on which the defendants commented were true and accurate, and the only issue ultimately before the jury was whether the words stating that the plaintiff had "danced a jig on the floor of the House" were in fact true and accurate. The chief witness for the defendants was one Bradley, a Parliamentary reporter, on whose report the article in the defendants' newspaper was based. The jury returned a verdict in favour of the defendants and the plaintiff's claim was dismissed. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal on the grounds (inter alia) that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence and that there had been a misdirection in the summing-up, and she applied, under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, for leave to recall the witness Bradley for cross-examination as to credit. The Court of Appeal now held that there was ample evidence to support the verdict of the jury and that there had been no misdirection in the summing-up. In regard to the plaintiff's application under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, the court held that further evidence which was directed only to the credit of a witness called at the trial could be admitted only where the court was satisfied that the additional evidence would necessarily have led a reasonable jury to a different conclusion from that arrived at, and, as they found it impossible to hold that that would have been the case on the facts before them, they dismissed the application and the appeal. The report deals only with the judgments on the application. The facts appear in the judgment of Tucker, L.J.

Paget, K.C., and Harold Lever for the plaintiff.
Sir Walter Monckton, K.C., and Milmo for the defendants.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from the verdict of a special jury in a trial before Lord Goddard, C.J., in which the plaintiff, Mrs. Braddock, was claiming damages for a libel, as she alleged, which had occurred in the Bolton Evening News, a newspaper of which the defendants, Tillotsons Newspapers, Ltd., are the proprietors, printers and publishers.

[His Lordship reviewed the evidence and the summing-up of Lord Goddard, C.J. ; held that there was ample evidence to support the verdict of the jury and that there had been no misdirection in the summing-up ; and continued :] I pass now to the second and, in my view, more important aspect of the case, namely, the application made by the plaintiff to recall the witness, Bradley, who was, undoubtedly, the most important witness for the defendants, in order that certain questions might be put to him by way of cross-examination. I am assuming, and it is purely a matter of assumption, that, if this witness had been recalled and these matters had been put to him, he would have admitted the accuracy of them, or, failing such admission, the defendants would have established them as facts. An affidavit has been put in by the plaintiff's solicitor, and he refers to the fact that Bradley was called as a witness at the hearing, and that it was on his report that the article in the defendants' newspaper was based. He was a Parliamentary reporter, employed by a news agency, and the plaintiff's solicitor says in his affidavit :

> " I am myself a member of Parliament, and I knew that the said Harold Douglas Bradley was in fact so employed, but I did not know him personally. Until the hearing of the action and for long afterwards I had no reason to suppose that the said Harold Douglas Bradley was not a person of good character, fit to be a member of the Press Gallery. I am informed and verily believe that some time after the said hearing the appropriate authorities of the House of Commons, acting on information received by them, had withdrawn permission for the said Harold Douglas Bradley to be a member of the Press Gallery. This information reached me some four weeks ago. I thereupon caused inquiries to be made. I am now informed, and verily believe that the said Harold Douglas Bradley is a person who has been many times convicted over a period of many years of stealing and other offences involving dishonesty, and that there are recorded eight or nine such convictions, the earliest in December, 1935, and the latest in December, 1948."

This trial took place on Nov. 11, 1948, so that the conviction in December, 1948, could not have been put to him at the trial. Furthermore, I would point out in passing that this affidavit does not state the precise dates on which these convictions took place, so one does not know whether or not, if this witness served in the Army, these convictions were all before, or how many of them were before, the period of his service in the Army, or whether some were current. However, I only mention that in passing.

The application is made pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, which reads :

> " The Court of Appeal shall have all the powers and duties as to amendment and otherwise of the High Court, together with full discretionary power to receive further evidence upon questions of fact, such evidence to be either by oral examination in court, by affidavit, or by deposition taken before an examiner or commissioner. Such further evidence may be given without special leave upon interlocutory applications, or in any case as to matters which have occurred after the date of the decision from which the appeal is brought. Upon appeals from a judgment after trial or hearing of any cause or matter upon the merits, such further evidence (save as to matters subsequent as aforesaid) shall be admitted on special grounds only, and not without special leave of the court."

It has been the invariable practice of this court to confine the admission of fresh evidence in circumstances such as this to evidence which could not reasonably have been discovered before the trial and to evidence which, if believed, either would be conclusive or, as has been said by some judges, would lead to the reasonable probability that the verdict would have been different. But the practice has hitherto been confined to evidence relating to an issue in the case, or, at any rate, to an issue which could and might yet be raised if there were a new trial in the action. No case has been cited in which this court has ever admitted, or been asked to admit, evidence going to credit only. That, of course, is not conclusive, and it is certainly not conclusive in regard to the jurisdiction of this court, and for myself, I think that this court clearly has jurisdiction to take any course which it thinks fit with regard to a matter of this kind. The invariable practice is, however, clear, and, furthermore, when one comes to apply the first test, viz., whether the evidence could have been discovered by reasonable diligence before the trial, that language is hardly applicable to evidence of this kind, because in the ordinary normal event a solicitor or a client would not be expected to inquire into the past record of any witness whom he expected to be called. Generally speaking, he would not know who were the witnesses who were going to be called. In this particular case it so happens that, owing to the necessity for petitioning the House of Commons with regard to these witnesses, in the course of what took place in the House of Commons the plaintiff's solicitor became aware of the name of the witness a week or so before the trial, so that, if inquiries had been made, I suppose it would have been possible for these facts to have been discovered. But I do not think that it is reasonable that any inquiries should have been made with regard to a man in this position. I am only saying that what has always been regarded as the essential test, viz., that the evidence could not have been obtained by reasonable diligence, is hardly applicable to a case of this kind.

There is no doubt that the evidence of this witness, Bradley, was the high water mark of the defendants' case. It is for us to decide what course we should take in this matter, having regard to what has been the invariable practice of the court in the past. There has been some variation in the language used by judges as to the quality of new evidence required by the court before it is admitted, namely, whether it must be such as is presumably to be believed and if believed would be conclusive, or whether it is sufficient if there is a reasonable possibility that, if it were brought before the jury, a different verdict would have been given. In Brown v. Dean (1) LORD LOREBURN, L.C., said ([1910] A.C. 374):

> " My Lords, the chief effect of the argument which your Lordships have heard is to confirm in my mind the extreme value of the old doctrine ' Interest > reipublicae ut sit finis litium,' remembering as we should that people who have means at their command are easily able to exhaust the resources of a poor antagonist. With great respect for the authority of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., I am of opinion that the order of the Divisional Court confirmed by the majority of the Court of Appeal is perfectly right. When a litigant has obtained a judgment in a court of justice, whether it be a county court or one of the High Courts, he is by law entitled not to be deprived of that judgment without very solid grounds ; and where (as in this case) the ground is the alleged discovery of new evidence, it must at least be such as is presumably to be believed, and if believed would be conclusive."

With regard to that, Lord Atkinson concurred. Lord Shaw, however, said (ibid., 376) :

> " My Lords, I concur, but I hope your Lordships will forgive me for expressing doubt upon a single point, and it is not really material to the judgment which has just been pronounced. It is upon the subject of res noviter veniens ad notitiam. Speaking for myself, I do not at present see my way to go the whole length of the proposition my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has proposed, to the effect that the res noviter veniens must, if believed, be conclusive. It is possible to figure cases in which it might be so gravely material and so clearly relevant as to entitle the court to say that that material and relevant fact should have been before the jury in giving its decision."

In R. v. Copestake, Ex p. Wilkinson (2), Lord Hanworth, M.R., after quoting the passage which I have just read from the speech of Lord Loreburn, L.C., in Brown v. Dean (1), said ([1927] 1 K.B. 474) :

> " That statement was not accepted by Lord Shaw, but the other learned Lords agreed with the Lord Chancellor, and the result of it would be that only such fresh evidence could be produced as would satisfy those conditions. That evidence must be of such a character that not merely is it relevant but of such importance that it would have affected the judgment of the tribunal if it had been before them at the original hearing of the case."

Scrutton, L.J., was inclined to the view of Lord Shaw. He said (ibid., 477) :

> " If, however, the justices had been entitled to re-open the question of paternity, then I think I should have held that there was fresh evidence of a kind enabling them to do so. In Nash v. Rochford Rural Council (3) the question of admission of fresh evidence was before this court, and we followed the rule laid down by Lord Chelmsford in Shedden v. Patrick (4), and stated it in much the same way as Hill, J., stated it in Timmins v. Timmins (5), to the effect that the evidence to be admitted must be of such importance as very probably to influence the decision. It seems to me that we in this court have not got so far as the full extent of Lord Loreburn's dictum in Brown v. Dean (1) that the new evidence must be of such a character that it is ' presumably to be believed, and if believed would be conclusive,' but I think we have clearly decided that it must be of such weight as, if believed, would probably have an important influence on the result."

There has been that variation in the language used by the learned judges on this point. These varying expressions have, so far as the decisions of the courts in this country are concerned, always been directed to evidence directly relative to the main issue in the action, or to some issue which could, or would, have been raised at the trial if the evidence had been discovered. It is not necessary in this case to express any opinion as to which is the better view with regard to the quality of the evidence in such a case. If, however, this court is to depart from its invariable practice of confining such evidence to the relative issues and is to admit fresh evidence directed solely to credit, I am of opinion that such a course would, if ever, only be justified where the evidence is of such a nature and the circumstances of the case are such that no reasonable jury could be expected to act on the evidence of the witness whose character has been called in question. It would, in my view, be wrong for this court to admit fresh evidence directed solely to credit, merely because there is a possibility, or merely a reasonable probability, that such evidence would result in a different verdict. There are two conflicting principles always operating in these matters. One is that everything should be done to ascertain the truth ; the other is that there should be some finality in litigation, and, so far as possible, a reasonable limitation of costs. It is to achieve the latter result that it is necessary for the court to impose some limit to the re-opening of decided issues, even at the risk that injustice may result or that there is a possibility of injustice resulting.

The only case relied on by counsel for the plaintiff in this appeal is R. v. Hamilton (6). In that case, in which the appellant had been convicted of receiving stolen property and of being an accessory after the fact to larceny, a witness called Jarvis had described himself at the trial as a motor engineer and said that he had an establishment of his own in Edgware Road and had been trained at Wembley. In cross-examination he said that his business was carried on under the name of Jarvis & Co., and he gave its address, that it was a limited company in the hands of his family, that he was the managing director, that the capital was £500, and that the business had been established three years before, and he gave particulars of the ages of his children and of the shares which they held. The application made in the Court of Criminal Appeal was to recall that witness that he might be cross-examined to show that his name was not Jarvis, but Jacobs, and that he had no business at the address which had been given. The application was granted, and ultimately the court quashed the conviction on the ground of misdirection at the trial. The case contains no indication of the principles on which that course was taken, but it is to be observed that it was taken pursuant to the special provisions in the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 9 (b). I need not set out that section, but it gives, in the widest possible terms complete and absolute power to the Court of Criminal Appeal to allow the calling of evidence or to call evidence on its own initiative, and the powers expressly conferred on the Court of Criminal Appeal are additional to its power to exercise all the ordinary powers of an appellate court in civil matters. The evidence in R. v. Hamilton (6) having been admitted pursuant to that section, I do not think that case can form any precedent for this court. Furthermore, although learned counsel described the evidence as going to credit only, which was in a sense true, it was for the purpose of challenging the accuracy of statements of fact which the witness had made at the trial. Moreover, as was pointed out by SINGLETON, L.J., in the course of the argument in this case, the object, the desire, or the principle that in these matters there should be some finality in litigation does not apply quite in the same way in criminal cases. There the principal aim is to see that in any event an innocent man shall not be convicted. With that end in view it may well be that it is proper to take a course which would not be appropriate in a civil case, which is a contest between two parties, and with regard to which the practice in the courts is, so far as possible, to keep the extent of the litigation reasonably within bounds.

For these reasons I think that the application to recall this witness for cross-examination must fail. I would only add that, in applying the test that I have adumbrated as being that which the court may possibly think right to take in other cases, it seems to me impossible to say in this case that, if these questions had been put to this witness and admitted, no reasonable jury could possibly have acted on his evidence. One does not know what view the jury might take in the case of a man who, when questions of this kind are put to him, may frankly admit them, and the putting of questions of this kind sometimes reacts to the detriment of the party who puts them. The jury would have to consider whether they thought that the fact that a man had been convicted of dishonesty necessarily made him an inaccurate reporter of what he had seen in the House of Commons on an occasion some time before the trial. In my view, this appeal fails. A

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion, and I find myself in such general agreement with what has fallen from the lips of my Lord that I only desire to deal with two points.

[His Lordship dealt with the summing-up and held that the criticisms of counsel for the plaintiff were not well founded, and continued :] The second B point, arising out of the summons to adduce further evidence, has given me greater difficulty. I think we must recognise that Bradley's evidence must have had considerable influence, though not necessarily conclusive influence, on the minds of the jury, and it is possible that they would have reached an opposite conclusion to that which they did reach had he been cross-examined and admitted the truth of the allegations referred to in the affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor, C but I agree with my Lord that it does not necessarily follow that this would have been the result. As counsel for the plaintiff frankly admitted, this application is, so far as this court is concerned, without precedent, and I think we should be dangerously extending the ambit of cases in which the powers conferred by R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, could be exercised if we were to allow Bradley to be recalled and cross-examined as to credit. D

When I say "without precedent," I am not overlooking R. v. Hamilton (6), in the Court of Criminal Appeal, to which my Lord has already referred, but I agree with my Lord that that case is different in two material respects. First, the evidence as to credit which it was there sought to adduce disproved facts alleged at the trial, and, secondly, there is a radical distinction between criminal and civil cases. In civil cases the interest of the republic is "ut sit finis litium," E whereas in criminal cases the dominant and paramount interest is that an innocent man should not be found guilty. It was no doubt, for this reason that the Crown in R. v. Hamilton (6) did not seek to oppose the application to have the witness recalled for cross-examination. In my view, if this court is to extend the ambit of cases in which it allows further evidence to be adduced on appeal to include the cases where the further evidence is directed only to F the credit of a witness called at the trial, it can, if it be right at all, only be right to do so in a case where the court is satisfied that the additional evidence must have led a reasonable jury to a different conclusion from that actually arrived at in the case. I find it impossible to say that that state of affairs is established in the case before us, and for these reasons I agree that the appeal fails and that the application to adduce further evidence should be dismissed. G

SINGLETON, L.J.: I am of the same opinion, and I think it right to add a few words in regard to the application under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4. Under that rule the Court of Appeal has full discretionary power to receive further evidence on questions of fact. The plaintiff seeks leave to offer additional oral evidence in that she wishes her counsel to be allowed to cross-examine one Bradley as to credit. Bradley gave evidence for the defendants. At that H time the plaintiff's advisers had not the information which they have since obtained, and they now wish to ask him questions as to his character, and, if necessary, they ask to be allowed to call a police officer to produce the record of Bradley who is said to have been convicted on a number of occasions of stealing or of offences involving dishonesty. The object of this is to support the plaintiff's application that the verdict and judgment in favour of the defendants be set aside, and that a new trial be had between the parties.

It is not often that the Court of Appeal grants an application that further evidence be heard. The principles on which the court acts are set out in the authorities, to three of which we have been referred. So far as one can find, there is no record of any application for the recalling of any witness so that he may be cross-examined as to his credit. The reason for this may well be that it cannot lead to any finality, it is not relevant to any issue, and it does not establish any fact which is an issue between the parties to the litigation. It is impossible to say how much importance the jury attach to the evidence of one witness when there are others, and it cannot be said positively, or with any degree of certainty, that the verdict would have been a different one if the jury had found that a particular witness had been convicted of some offence or offences. Under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, power is given to this court to receive further evidence on questions of fact. Prima facie that means on questions of fact material to an issue in the action. Assuming that the court has power to order the recall of a witness for the purpose of his being cross-examined as to credit, it is clear that that power should be exercised sparingly and only in very special circumstances. I do not regard this as a case in which the court, in its discretion, ought to make such an order. It leads nowhere ; there is no finality about it. If the court were to make the order asked for, it would be a departure from the well-recognised practice of the court, and it would lead to countless applications in other cases. This may appear to be a hardship on the plaintiff, but she is in the same position as any other litigant, and her case must be dealt with in just the same way as theirs—she would not have it otherwise.

R. v. Hamilton (6) was cited by counsel for the plaintiff in support of his application. I do not regard that as an authority covering this sort of case in this court. In R. v. Hamilton (6) the main attack was on the direction given by the trial judge to the jury, and that attack succeeded after the court had examined fully into the facts. During the argument or the submission of counsel for the appellant it appeared that a witness for the prosecution had given some evidence which the defence—the appellant—was then in a position to say was false, and counsel asked for leave to call evidence to show that. It was from the court that the suggestion came that that witness might be recalled, and the court drew attention to the powers given to the Court of Criminal Appeal under the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 9 (b), and, as one can well understand, no objection was taken by counsel for the Crown. The circumstances here are quite different, and I can find no reason in this case for departing from what has always been, so far as one can find, the practice of this court.

For these reasons I agree that the appeal and the application must both be dismissed.

Appeal and application dismissed with costs.

MINISTER OF PENSIONS v. HORSEY.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), May 6, June 2, 1949.]

Pension—Service patient in emergency services hospital—Negligence in treatment—Entitlement to award under the Royal Warrant, 1946 (Cmd. 6489), arts. 4, 56.

Pension — Appeal — Determination — Majority decision of tribunal — Validity—Pensions Appeal Tribunals Act, 1943 (c. 39), s. 6, sched., para. 3.

The respondent, a serving officer in the Royal Navy, broke his arm in A felling a tree when at home on leave. He was taken to the nearest hospital at Penzance and on the following day he was moved to an emergency services hospital at Truro. Here he was so negligently treated that his right hand was damaged beyond repair and he was placed on the retired list. An action brought by him against certain members of the hospital medical staff was settled before trial by the payment of substantial damages, B and he also claimed a pension under the Royal Warrant, 1946, on the ground that his disability was attributable to war service. By a majority, the legal chairman dissenting, the pensions appeal tribunal allowed his appeal and the Minister of Pensions appealed against that decision as being wrong in law.

HELD : (i) that if the respondent went to the Truro hospital merely C because it was the nearest or most convenient he was in the same position as if he were a civilian and would have no claim to an award, but if he were compelled to go because he was in the Royal Navy he would be in the same position as a patient in a service hospital and would be entitled to an award in respect of negligent treatment.

(ii) the case must be remitted to the tribunal to decide whether or not D the respondent was a compulsory patient at Truro.

(iii) that, as there was no provision in the Pensions Appeal Tribunals Act, 1943, empowering a tribunal to allow an appeal by a majority decision, a claim to a pension or award could only be allowed by the unanimous decision of the tribunal.

APPEAL by the Minister of Pensions against a decision of a pensions appeal tribunal allowing by a majority the claim of the respondent to an award in respect of permanent injury to his arm due to negligent treatment received while an in-patient at an emergency services hospital. The appeal was allowed and the case sent back to the tribunal to determine whether or not the respondent entered H the hospital voluntarily, and to decide accordingly in the terms of the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 2. ORMEROD, J., read the following judgment. The respondent was an officer in the Royal Navy who broke his right arm on Oct. 16, 1944, when at home on leave. He was taken to the nearest civilian hospital where an X-ray disclosed a fracture of both bones of the forearm and the next day he was moved —I use that term as a neutral word—to the Royal Cornwall Emergency Medical Services Hospital, Truro, for treatment. He was treated so negligently in the hospital at Truro that his right hand was damaged beyond repair and he was placed on the retired list on Jan. 5, 1946. The respondent then claimed that the consequences of his injury were attributable to war service. The claim was rejected by the Minister of Pensions. The respondent appealed, and a pensions appeal tribunal decided by a majority that the responsibility of the service continued while he was in an officers' ward in a civilian hospital, and the appeal was allowed. These facts, are beyond any dispute.

Two questions were, accordingly, submitted for decision by this court :— (i) that the tribunal was wrong in law in allowing the appeal and (ii) that the decision of the tribunal, being a majority decision, was of no effect. On the first question my attention was drawn to a number of decisions where members of the services had been treated in civilian hospitals and it had been held that there was no liability for pension even though there might have been delay or negligence in treatment. That is not necessarily the position here. There was no sufficient evidence before the tribunal that the circumstances in which the respondent came to be treated in the Truro hospital had been fully investigated. If he went there merely because it was the nearest and most convenient civilian hospital, then, clearly, he is in the same position as if he were a civilian. If, on the other hand, it was his duty by reason of the conditions of his service to attend that hospital, then he was in the same position as he would have been had he been sent to a service hospital. I must assume that in the ordinary way he would have received skilled and careful treatment in a civilian hospital. That is an assumption which is made in favour of an appellant and I think it is an assumption which must be made in a case of this kind. He did not receive it in the hospital to which it was his duty to go, and if these are the facts, then I find that he is entitled to an award. This question was not fully investigated by the tribunal and the case must go back to be dealt with on those lines.

In these circumstances the second question does not arise, but, as my attention has been drawn to it, I think, perhaps, I should say what are my views on that point. It has already been decided by Denning, J., in Brain v. Minister of Pensions (1) that a claim to a pension is not to be rejected unless the tribunal is unanimous in rejecting it. It was argued on behalf of the respondent that this rule should not apply to a case where the tribunal was not unanimous in allowing a claim as the onus of proof is on the Minister, and, unless all the members of the tribunal are satisfied that the onus is discharged, the claim must be allowed. I cannot accept that argument. A majority verdict in a criminal trial cannot be accepted whether the majority is in favour of conviction or acquittal, and it matters not for this purpose that the burden of proof is on the prosecution. Accepting as I do, and, indeed, as I think I must, the decision of Denning, J., that a claim to a pension cannot be rejected by a majority, I am satisfied, too, that a claim should not be allowed except by the unanimous decision of the members of the tribunal. Denning, J., pointed out in Brain's case (1) the serious risk of error in a decision of a majority. That risk is equally great whether the decision be in favour of one party or the other. There is no express statutory provision that the decision of the majority shall be effective, and in these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that a claim cannot be allowed unless there is a unanimous decision of the tribunal.

In these circumstances it follows that the case must be sent back to be dealt with by another tribunal, and the appeal is allowed.

Appeal allowed : case remitted.

Re ISLE OF THANET ELECTRIC SUPPLY CO., LTD.

[Chancery Division (Roxburgh, J.), July 8, 1949.]

Appeal—Court of Appeal—Extension of time—Power of judge to grant extension —" Order . . . in . . . matter not being an action "—Company winding-up —Distribution of surplus assets—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15.

By an originating summons dated Dec. 13, 1948, the liquidator of the Isle of Thanet Electric Supply Co., Ltd., in its voluntary winding-up sought the determination by the court of a question relating to the distribution of the surplus assets of the company between the holders of the preference stock and the holders of the ordinary stock. On Feb. 18, 1949, Roxburgh, J., declared that the surplus assets ought to be distributed on the footing that the holders of the preference stock were entitled to participate with the holders of the ordinary stock rateably in proportion to the nominal amount of the stocks held by them respectively. The order was passed and entered on May 26, 1949, and an ordinary stockholder now applied for leave to appeal against it.

Held : the court had jurisdiction under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15, to enlarge the time for appeal, and it was proper to exercise that jurisdiction in this case.

Application for leave to appeal out of time from a decision relating to the distribution of the surplus assets of a company given in the winding-up of the company. Roxburgh, J., held that under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15, he had jurisdiction to enlarge the time for the lodging of the notice of appeal.

ROXBURGH, J. : This was a summons in companies winding-up in which the class rights of preference and ordinary shareholders were in issue. It is a case in which, above all others, there should be an appeal because, since my decision, the House of Lords has thrown much light on the problem in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (1). If a decision of importance bearing on the matters in issue is given after the hearing before the judge, but within the possible time for appealing, obviously the matter ought to be open to re-consideration. The question which puzzled me a little was whether I, as distinct from the Court of Appeal, have any jurisdiction to entertain this application. I am satisfied that I have, though the position at first sight was rather obscure. R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 9, provides :

> " The time for appealing from any order or decision made or given in the matter of the winding-up of a company under the provisions of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, or any Act amending the same or any order or decision made in the matter of any bankruptcy, or in any other matter not being an action, shall be the same as the time limited for appeal from an interlocutory order under r. 15."

This was an order falling within r. 9. Order 58, r. 15, provides :

> " Subject and without prejudice to the power of the Court of Appeal under Ord. 64, r. 7, no appeal to the Court of Appeal from any interlocutory order, or from any order, whether final or interlocutory, in any matter not being an action, shall be brought after the expiration of fourteen days, and no other appeal shall be brought after the expiration of six weeks, A unless the court or judge at the time of making the order or at any time subsequently or the Court of Appeal shall enlarge the time."

I have confirmed, by referring to the Statutory Rules and Orders, that there ought to be a comma after the words " six weeks." The point is not without its importance, because, in the absence of that comma, it might be thought that the proviso which follows those words did not qualify the whole of the B previous words, but with the presence of that comma I do not think that point would be arguable. That rule seems to me plainly to confer on me a discretion to enlarge the time, either at the time of the making of the order or at any time subsequently.

Order 58, r. 17, provides :

> C " Wherever under these rules an application may be made either to the court below or to the Court of Appeal . . . it shall be made in the first instance to the court or judge below."

In view of the fact that it appears to me to be for the Court of Appeal rather than for me to discuss the bearing, if any, of Ord. 58, r. 17, on Ord. 64, r. 7, which I am going to read, I say nothing more about Ord. 58, r. 17, because D it does not affect the question of my jurisdiction. Order 64, r. 7, provides—and it will be remembered that the whole of Ord. 58, r. 15, is expressly made subject to this rule :

> " A court or a judge shall have power to enlarge or abridge the time appointed by these rules, or fixed by any order enlarging time, for doing any act or taking any proceeding, upon such terms (if any) as the justice of E the case may require, and any such enlargement may be ordered although the application for the same is not made until after the expiration of the time appointed or allowed."

The ANNUAL PRACTICE in many places refers to Ord. 58, r. 15, the material part of which was introduced in 1913, and indicates that under that rule the judge of first instance has power to extend the time for appeal, but there is F a note to Ord. 64, r. 7, which, though I think on close inspection it is quite accurate, is liable to be misunderstood if cursorily read. Under the general heading : " Applications under this rule "—it is stated (1948 ed., p. 1444) :

> " Thus application for extension of time to appeal to the Court of Appeal must be made to that court . . ."

G As a matter of construction, those words are clearly governed by the words " under this rule " which open the paragraph. It is not suggested that I have any jurisdiction to act under Ord. 64, r. 7, but, undoubtedly, that note would read more clearly if it repeated the words " under this rule " and added some such words as " but see Ord. 58, r. 15." With that amendment there would be no possibility of misunderstanding. I feel no doubt that I have jurisdiction H to extend the time, and I extend it accordingly.

Maintenance—Order made in New South Wales—Enforcement—Award to wife and child—Custody given to wife—Validity of custody order—Amount of order exceeding jurisdiction of English court—Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920 (c. 33), s. 4 (1), (3) ; s. 10.

A wife resident in New South Wales obtained a maintenance order in the Sydney Children's Court against her husband, then resident at Uxbridge, Middlesex, ordering him to pay her £2 16*s.* 0*d.* a week for her own maintenance and £1 4*s.* 0*d.* for her infant child, the custody being granted to her by the same order. Under Australian law the order, having been made in the absence of the husband, required confirmation by a court of summary jurisdiction in this country, and it was confirmed by the Uxbridge justices. On appeal by the husband, Held : (i) on the construction of the relevant Australian statutes the court at Sydney had jurisdiction to make an order against the husband for the maintenance of the child if they committed the custody of the child to the wife ; they had given the wife the custody ; and, therefore, the child was a " dependant " of the husband within the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, s. 10, with the result that the order was enforceable in this country in toto and the justices had power to confirm it under s. 4 (1) of the Act of 1920.

(ii) the husband was entitled under s. 4 (3) of the Act to raise before the justices and on appeal the question of the validity of the order for custody and that of his ability to pay under the other provisions of the order in the same way as that in which he could have raised those questions before the Sydney court, had he been present, but he had not in fact shown that he was entitled to any relief in respect of those matters.

(iii) the fact that the order was for an amount greater than an English court could at present award was immaterial and the appeal failed.

Appeal by the husband from an order of Uxbridge (Middlesex) justices, dated April 20, 1949, confirming a maintenance order made on Oct. 15, 1948, by the Children's Court of Sydney, New South Wales.

The order was made on the application of the wife who was resident with her child in New South Wales. The husband, who lived at Uxbridge, contended that the English court had no jurisdiction to confirm that part of the order which related to the child and that the custody of the child should be given to him. He further contended that the amount of the award was too large and should only have been confirmed for a lesser sum. The Divisional Court found against the husband on both points and also held that he had failed to prove that the award should be reviewed on account of his inability to pay the full amount and the appeal was dismissed.

Heseltine for the husband.

The wife did not appear.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is an appeal by a husband against the decision of Uxbridge justices confirming an order, technically called a maintenance order, made by the Children's Court at Sydney, New South Wales. On the application of the wife, who is now resident in New South Wales, that court awarded, in terms of English money, £2 16*s.* 0*d.* for her and £1 4*s.* 0*d.* in respect of the infant child of the marriage, a girl aged 5, who is also resident A in that State. By the same order the court gave the custody of the child to the wife. The confirmation of this order by the Uxbridge justices is challenged on a number of grounds. It is said that they had no jurisdiction to confirm that part of the order which related to the custody of the child. At the same time it is said that equally they had no power to interfere with it, and, therefore, the custody order should be allowed to stand in so far as it is made by the court B in New South Wales. Alternatively, it is said that the Uxbridge justices should have substituted an order in favour of the husband for the custody of the child. As regards the amount awarded by the order, while it is admitted that there was jurisdiction to make an award in favour of the wife, it is said that the sum is too large and should have been confirmed for some lesser sum, and, incidentally or alternatively, that, if it was admissible to include any allowance for the wife C in respect of the child, the sum should not have been as large as £1 4*s.* 0*d.*

The jurisdiction of the Uxbridge magistrates depends upon the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, and on the fact that there are reciprocal arrangements between this country and the State of New South Wales for the enforcement of maintenance orders in these matrimonial matters. As that fact is admitted and indisputable, I do not propose to go into the D machinery whereby the reciprocity has been effected. Suffice it to say that it is admitted that the Act applies in this country and that the corresponding Act in New South Wales, the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1923, operates reciprocally in that State.

The expression "maintenance order" is defined by the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, s. 10, as follows :

> E "For the purposes of this Act, the expression 'maintenance order' means an order other than an order of affiliation for the periodical payment of sums of money towards the maintenance of the wife or other dependants of the person against whom the order is made, and the expression 'dependants' means such persons as that person is, according to the law in force in the part of His Majesty's dominions in which the maintenance order was made, F liable to maintain."

There are, therefore, two classes of persons in respect of whom a maintenance order may be made. The first is the wife. Mrs. Harris, the respondent to this appeal, is the wife, and comes within this s. 10, and it is admitted that in respect of her it was competent in the Children's Court in Sydney to make the order and competent in the Uxbridge justices to confirm it. With respect G to the child, however, it is necessary to discover how and why she is a person whom, according to the law in force in New South Wales, the husband was liable to maintain. For that purpose it is necessary to see on what authority maintenance in respect of the child (or, to be more accurate, an allowance to the wife in respect of the child), was included in this order, and when it is understood how that has happened it will, I think, be apparent that the argument H that the inclusion of a custody order was wrong and that the justices at Uxbridge had no jurisdiction to deal with it is fallacious.

We have no expert advice about the law in force in New South Wales and it was only at our instance that research was made into this topic because it was clear that it governs the interpretation of the word "dependants" in s. 10 of the Act of 1920 of the Imperial Parliament. It is impossible, therefore, to speak with complete certainty about the relevant Australian Acts, but it is to be observed that in the very full record with which we have been presented it is stated that the proceedings in New South Wales took place under the Deserted Wives and Children Act, 1901, and the Child Welfare Act, 1939, and I think it may be taken to be reasonably clear that those dates are the beginning and end of a code dealing with this subject-matter sometimes referred to as the Deserted Wives and Children Acts, 1901-1939, and the Child Welfare Act, 1939. One of the orders emanating from the court in New South Wales is thus headed. We have been shown the chronological table of statutes in force in New South Wales in 1939, from which it appears that the section now governing this matter, and standing unrepealed in 1939, is the Deserted Wives and Children Act, 1901, s. 7, as amended by s. 3 of the Deserted Wives and Children Amending Act, 1913. That section clearly differs in very marked respects from s. 7 of the Act of 1901. The material part is sub-s. (1) which provides :

> " (1) Upon the hearing the justices shall inquire into the matter of the complaint ; and (a) if they are satisfied that the wife is in fact left without means of support, they may order the defendant to pay for the use of the wife such allowance as they think reasonable, and in addition may commit the legal custody of any child of the marriage to the wife or such other person as they think proper, and order the defendant to pay for the support of such child such allowance as they think reasonable ; (b) if they are satisfied that any child of the defendant is in fact left without means of support, they may order the defendant to pay for the support of such child such allowance as they think reasonable and may commit the child to the legal custody of the wife or such other person as they think proper."

We are not strictly concerned with paragraph (b), because it is clear that the order was not made under that paragraph, but it is plain that under that paragraph the matter can be dealt with on the lines that the substantive order is made in favour of a child whose custody may be committed to the wife (if there is a wife) or to any other person. We are obviously concerned, in my opinion, with the first paragraph, and it is manifest that the scheme of the first paragraph is, in substance though not in actual wording, the same as the scheme of our own Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, whereby, assuming that the custody is given to the wife, any allowance made in respect of the child is, so to speak, ancillary to the allowance, if any, made in respect of the wife, and is made in view of the fact that the custody is awarded to the wife.

That is what has happened in this case. A perusal of the orders and the recitals in the orders makes it clear that it was because custody was awarded to the wife that the allowance of £1 4*s*. 0*d*. in respect of the child was added to the allowance of £2 16*s*. 0*d*. in respect of the wife. In other words, on this branch of the jurisdiction of the Children's Court in Sydney it is a condition precedent to the making of the order in this form that custody of the child should be awarded to the wife. If that is right, it is idle to speak of the Uxbridge justices having no jurisdiction to confirm the order in as much as it purported to contain a custody order. What they are confirming is a maintenance order, but it is a composite maintenance order. It specifies a sum of money directly payable to the wife as such and a further sum of money payable to her by way of allowance for the child because the custody of the child has been committed to her, and it is precisely because the custody of the child has been committed to her that, in the words of the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, s. 10, this child is a dependant whom the husband is liable to maintain according to the laws in force in New South Wales. Therefore, the sum awarded in respect of the child is properly called a maintenance order within the definition of the section. That is not to say that there are no other ways in which the husband could have been made liable to maintain the child. It is only to say that within that definition and for those reasons this order is properly called a maintenance order, and, therefore, is enforceable in toto. That seems to dispose entirely of the suggestion that the Uxbridge justices had no jurisdiction to deal with that part of the order which incidentally awarded custody of the child to the wife.

The matter does not end there. Jurisdiction is one thing and the obligation to confirm is another. That brings me to the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, s. 4 (3), which enacts that at the hearing it shall be open to the person on whom the summons was served (that is, the summons for confirmation) to raise any defence which he might have raised in the original proceedings had he been a party thereto. Pausing there, I ought, perhaps, to have said in passing that it is clear that a provision in the corresponding statute in New South Wales—the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1923, to which I have already referred but which I do not propose to quote—enables an order to be made against a husband in his absence (that is, without service), but such an order is expressed to be provisional only until it has been confirmed by the appropriate court in the country of his residence. That is the meaning and point of the words "had he been a party thereto." Section 4 (3) of our Act of 1920 reads :

> "At the hearing it shall be open to the person on whom the summons was served to raise any defence which he might have raised in the original proceedings had he been a party thereto, but no other defence, and the certificate from the court which made the provisional order stating the grounds on which the making of the order might have been opposed if the person against whom the order was made had been a party to the proceedings shall be conclusive evidence that those grounds are grounds on which objection may be taken."

At first sight it might be thought that the certificate from the court as to the grounds on which objection might have been taken are themselves exclusive, but it is clear on authority that they are not. The certificate is conclusive that objection might have been taken on certain grounds, but it is not exclusive of the possibility that other grounds of objection were open. That is clear from the decision of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division in Re Wheat (1). There, as in this case, there was a certificate from the court which made the provisional order setting out the grounds on which the husband could have objected to the order, but there was no reference, among other things, to objections to the jurisdiction which went to the root of the whole matter, and the metropolitan magistrate who dealt with that case asked for the guidance of the Divisional Court on that matter. After reading the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, s. 10 (3), HUMPHREYS, J., delivering the judgment of the court, said ([1932] 2 K.B. 725) :

> "The learned magistrate asks this court to say whether he was right in holding that the above provision did not preclude the husband from raising the defence of want of jurisdiction in the court which made the provisional order, although that ground of defence was not included in the certificate of grounds on which the making of the provisional order might have been opposed. In our opinion he was plainly right in so holding. The sub-section makes the certificate conclusive evidence that the grounds stated therein are grounds upon which objection may be taken, but does not confine the possible objections to those grounds. The only limitation upon the objections which may be raised by the person opposing the confirmation of the order is that the objection must be one which would have been open to him upon the original proceedings had he been a party to them."

HUMPHREYS, J., then points out that objection to the jurisdiction would clearly have been such a ground.

If I am right in what I have said about the grounds on which this order can properly be described as a maintenance order in respect of the incidental inclusion therein of the custody order, it follows that it must be open to the husband to say that no order for custody should have been given to the wife by the Children's Court in New South Wales, and, therefore, no allowance for the child should have been included in this maintenance order. Precisely the same observation applies, on the question of amount. Manifestly, had the husband been present in the Children's Court in Sydney he would have been able to discuss the question of his means, his income and his liabilities, and those of the wife, and all the rest of it. In other words, it would have been open to him to put forward such contentions as occurred to him about the amount to be awarded both in respect of the maintenance to be paid directly to the wife and the allowance in respect of the child of whom she was awarded the custody. In my opinion, all those matters are objections which would have been open to him on the original proceedings had he been a party to them, and, therefore, were open to discussion before the Uxbridge justices and before us. One now has to approach these two questions on the merits. With regard to the question of custody, I have ventured to point out already that this child, a girl of 5, is in New South Wales, where her mother, who appeared before the court there, is also living, and it seems to me, apart from anything else, to be obvious that so far as the suitability of the wife to have the custody and the duty of looking after this child's welfare is concerned the Children's Court in Sydney is far better qualified either than the Uxbridge justices or ourselves to deal with the matter. A correspondence has been read to us, as it was read to the Uxbridge justices. It is suggested that it shows that the wife is indifferent to the welfare of the child. I do not take that view at all. I am bound to say that that correspondence has sown considerable doubt in my mind whether the husband is really concerned with the welfare of the child. As the Uxbridge justices point out, he has now made a new home with another woman, by whom he has had a child, and with regard to this liaison he wrote to his wife as early as February, 1947, saying that he had no regrets and that was the end of their marriage so far as he was concerned. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, I assume that the court in New South Wales is in the same position as courts in this country to re-consider at any time the question of custody. It is obvious from the Deserted Wives and Children Act, 1901, s. 7, as amended by the Deserted Wives and Children Amending Act, 1913, s. 3, which I have read, that they have ample jurisdiction to award the custody not only to the wife but to any other suitable person, and the Infants' Custody and Settlements Act, 1899, s. 17, as amended by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1934, s. 3 (a), reproduces in substance the provisions of our own Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, enacting that the welfare of the child in these matters shall be the paramount consideration. It is a commonplace to say that there is no finality in connection with custody orders. They are liable to be changed with the changing circumstances from day to day. If there is any ground for putting forward fresh considerations in the Children's Court in New South Wales, I have not the slightest doubt that that court will give the fullest possible weight to whatever is put before it, without feeling itself in the least hampered by anything which the Uxbridge justices have said, or we have said, or it has said itself on previous occasions. That we have jurisdiction to review the question of custody I do not doubt, for the reasons I have given. There is one other consideration which seems to me to be not unimportant. It is the rarest possible thing for a judge of this Division of the High Court to make a custody order in respect of a child who is out of the jurisdiction. This child is out of our jurisdiction and that of the Uxbridge justices, and it would need evidence a great deal stronger than anything that has been produced before us to induce me even to consider the propriety of making an order adverse to that of the court in whose jurisdiction this child is living. On the merits, therefore, whatever be our jurisdiction, I consider that this application is entirely misconceived, particularly in view of the fact that it has been stated more than once that all that is desired is to strike all mention of custody out of the confirmation by the Uxbridge justices, while leaving it standing in the order of the court in New South Wales. There I leave the question of custody.

As regards the amount, I ought to say in passing that it is conceded, and must be conceded in view of the decision in Peagram v. Peagram (2), that the mere fact that this order is made for an amount which, in respect of both the wife's maintenance and the allowance in respect of the child, is higher than that which can be awarded by a court of summary jurisdiction in this country is neither here nor there. The Uxbridge justices have jurisdiction to confirm this order, properly made so far as jurisdiction is concerned in New South Wales, notwithstanding the fact that the amount exceeds that which in their own jurisdiction they could award. In my opinion, there is jurisdiction to consider the question of amount, on the simple ground that the husband could have objected, had be been present, to either of the amounts as such, but, here again, the question is whether we should interfere. The evidence is that whereas the wife is left practically penniless, and the child, obviously, is not in good health and needs attention, the husband has ruthlessly cut off all supplies since March, 1948, while, on his own evidence, his gross income is £672 a year. From that he has deducted every conceivable thing which can be deducted, and has reduced his disposable income to £400 a year. Out of that he has been ordered to pay his wife and child, in round figures, £4 a week, or just over £200 a year, leaving about £200 of disposable income after he has paid his house-rent, insurances, income-tax and all the rest of it, and it is said that the order against him is too high because, forsooth, he has taken a mistress and has had a child by her. I think that both the New South Wales court and the Uxbridge justices knew all about that, and, for my part, I can see no question of principle which would justify us in saying that this amount is too high. I am comforted by the reflection that under s. 4 (6) of the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, it is open to the husband to apply to the Uxbridge justices, if he is so advised, to apply for a variation or reduction, but if the justices of Uxbridge think it is necessary and right to give the wife an opportunity of giving evidence they can do so by remitting the case to the court which made the order. Also the court which made the order has power, under s. 5 (5) of the New South Wales Act of 1923, to vary the order, notwithstanding that it has been confirmed by the Uxbridge justices. So the husband, if he finds that things are really too hard for him and can prove it to the satisfaction of the court, has a remedy, and I do not doubt that the court at Sydney would deal faithfully with any proper representations that are made to it, either on remittance by the Uxbridge justices or on direct application by the husband, if the circumstances warrant it. For the moment I can see no ground on which we should be justified in interfering with this order as it stands.

I am of opinion for these reasons that the Uxbridge justices had jurisdiction to confirm this order and that on the merits there was no reason for their not doing so, either as regards the substance of the order or as regards the amount in either respect. This appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Damage—Remoteness—Breach of contract—Contract by defendant to form company—Agreement by plaintiff to contribute capital—Sale of shares to provide funds—Contract repudiated by defendant—Shares re-purchased at enhanced cost—Recovery of excess.

The plaintiff agreed with the defendant that he would provide capital for the formation of a limited company to exploit for building purposes a material which the defendant had invented. Unknown to the defendant, the plaintiff, to provide the necessary funds, disposed of a block of shares. The defendant subsequently refused to go on with the matter, and the plaintiff thereupon bought an equal number of the same shares. Owing to fluctuations in the market they cost him £245 more than he had received on the sale.

Held: there were no "special circumstances" from which knowledge should be imputed to the defendant that the plaintiff might have to sell his shares and re-purchase them at a loss, nor could such loss be said to "arise naturally" from the breach of contract; the case was, therefore, not covered by the rules in Hadley v. Baxendale (1854) (9 Exch. 341); and the sum of £245 was not recoverable by the plaintiff from the defendant as damages.

(2) Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 997.

Appeal by the defendant from a judgment of Humphreys, J., dated Feb. 11, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 507, whereby he awarded the plaintiff damages for breach of contract.

In 1946 the plaintiff, a civil engineer, answered an advertisement inserted in a newspaper by the agents of the defendant, the inventor of "Lignacite," a material for building purposes designed to take the place of concrete. To exploit the invention the defendant was proposing to form a limited company which would have a share capital of £8,500, of which £1,000 would be ordinary shares of £1 each allotted to the defendant and the balance a working capital of £7,500 in six per cent. preference shares of £1 each to be subscribed in cash by three directors in equal amounts of £2,500 each. The plaintiff agreed to subscribe £2,500 and two other intending directors, one Cox and one Baynton, agreed to subscribe £1,000 and £1,500 respectively. After consultation with the plaintiff's bank it was agreed that the four parties should form a company to be called Lignacite (South Eastern), Ltd., with a working capital of £5,000 only. This was confirmed by letters of Sept. 3, and 4, 1946, between the plaintiff and the defendant, final terms being settled at a meeting held on Sept. 9, 1946. In pursuance of the agreement the three directors providing capital agreed between them to find £2,000 at once, the plaintiff producing £1,000 and Mr. Baynton and Mr. Cox £500 each. To provide his share the plaintiff disposed of a block of Central Argentine Railway shares which realised £1,042. On Sept. 11 the defendant sent a letter to the plaintiff, which the latter received on Sept. 13, stating that the proposal to form the company with a subscribed capital of £5,000 only was unacceptable to him (the defendant), and that, unless the plaintiff could arrange for the subscription of the complete nominal capital of £7,500, the defendant was unable to proceed further in the matter. On Sept. 16 the plaintiff re-purchased the shares which he had sold, and for them, owing to fluctuations in the market, he had to pay, with expenses amounting to £5, an additional £250. HUMPHREYS, J., held that there had been A a breach of contract by the defendant and that the extra cost at which the plaintiff had to re-purchase the shares was recoverable as damages. The Court of Appeal now held that, apart from the £5 expenses, the extra cost of the shares was not recoverable and allowed the appeal.

B

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., in an action in which he awarded the plaintiff £250 damages for breach of contract. There were issues at the trial whether there had been a concluded contract, and, if so, whether it was repudiated by the plaintiff or by the defendant. Both these issues were decided on the facts in favour of the plaintiff and there C is no appeal by the defendant with regard thereto. The appeal before us relates only to the assessment of damages.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued :] It was submitted on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff had failed to show any damage resulting to him from the defendant's breach of contract. It was argued that there were no "special circumstances" which would bring the case within the second D rule for assessing damages laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (1) and that the facts clearly did not bring the case within the first rule. Hadley v. Baxendale (1) and the cases that followed it have recently been considered by this court in Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (2), and the result of the authorities is summarised in the judgment in the latter case. In the present case HUMPHREYS, J., said clearly that he did not think there were any E "special circumstances." After referring to Hadley v. Baxendale (1) and quoting a passage from the judgment of ALDERSON, B., he said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 509) :

> "Then he deals with the case of special circumstances. It is not suggested that there are any special circumstances in the present case, so it is the first rule that applies."

F Notwithstanding that, counsel for the plaintiff has submitted that there were special circumstances from which, at any rate, knowledge should be imputed to the defendant that it was a serious possibility or that there was a real danger that the plaintiff might have to sell his shares ; that, if he sold them, he might wish to re-purchase them ; and that, if he did that, there might be a loss on the transaction. If that knowledge cannot be shown G to have existed in fact or if it cannot be imputed, none the less counsel submits that he can bring himself under the first rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (1), namely, that in cases of breach of contract the aggrieved party is entitled to recover such part of the loss as was, at the time of the contract, reasonably foreseeable as likely to result from a breach.

In my view, however, the evidence is quite insufficient to bring the case within H the rules in Hadley v. Baxendale (1). We were referred to passages in the evidence from which it appears that at an interview a conversation took place in which the plaintiff was asked whether he had money available or whether he would have money available. The use of the expression "available" shows, it is said, that the defendant knew or ought to have known that the plaintiff had not got the money in actual cash. A similar conversation took place after the final terms of the contract had been settled on Sept. 9. Generally speaking, when one man contracts with another that that other will provide a sum of money, it is no concern of his to enquire where and how the other party is going to obtain the money which will enable him to implement his contract. There may be special cases in which it is expressly brought to the notice of one party that the other party will have to take certain definite steps to obtain the money, but I think it would be going beyond any previous authority to say that, in a case of this kind, the contract being eventually broken, the plaintiff can recover as part of his damages the loss he has suffered from realising shares A and then buying them back again. In the present case the plaintiff obtained £1,042 for the sale of his shares, and up to that moment I cannot see that he suffered any loss at all. He chose to re-invest the money in the shares which he formerly held. That choice of his resulted in his having to pay an additional sum to buy back the same number of shares as he owned before. I cannot see on what principle the defendant can be made liable for that additional sum. B There are no sufficient special circumstances from which knowledge can be imputed to the defendant and this case clearly does not come within the main rule in Hadley v. Baxendale (1).

The learned judge seems to have dealt with the case as if the contract was a contract for the sale and purchase of shares in the Argentine Railway and to have held that the plaintiff was acting reasonably when he bought back those shares. C That would have been a proper test if the contract had been one relating to the sale and purchase of those shares. The contract, however, related, not to those shares, but to shares in a new company to be formed, and nobody knows what the value of the latter shares would have been if the plaintiff had ever acquired them. The measure of his damage is the difference between the shares he would have been entitled to in the new company and his present D position. As to that, nobody knows what it is. I think the learned judge came to a wrong decision, and that the plaintiff's claim cannot be substantiated on any of the principles governing the assessment or the measure of damages in cases of breach of contract. The highest at which it could be put for the plaintiff would be to say that he might have been entitled to some quite nominal sum for the period of time during which this money had lain idle, i.e., from Sept. E 5 to 16. Some small sum might possibly have been added in respect thereof to the sum of £5 which it is conceded he is entitled to recover for incidental expenses. I think this appeal should succeed and should be allowed with costs.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of His Honour JUDGE SCOBELL ARMSTRONG at Plymouth County Court, dated Oct. 28, 1948.

The plaintiff was the lessee of a house at Plymouth which formerly belonged to the Great Western Railway but became vested in the British Transport Commission under the Transport Act, 1947, and the defendant was the subtenant of some rooms in the house which constituted a separate dwelling within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The plaintiff sued for possession of the rooms, and the defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The county court judge held that the house must be regarded as owned by the Crown and administered by the Transport Commission as agents of the Crown, and, as the Crown was not bound by the Rent Acts, he made an order for possession. The Court of Appeal reversed his decision, and remitted the case to the county court to be dealt with on the basis that the house was within the Rent Restrictions Acts. No opinion was expressed whether, if the house had been Crown property, the plaintiff, as lessee of the Crown, would have been able to avail himself of the rule that the Rent Acts did not bind the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8. DENNING, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. The plaintiff was the lessee of a house No. 2, Buckland Street, Plymouth, which used to belong to the Great Western Railway. The defendant was the sub-tenant of some rooms in the house and was protected in those days by the Rent Restrictions Acts. On the nationalisation of the railways, however, the house became vested in the British Transport Commission, and the county court judge has held that on that account the defendant has lost the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The judge said that the house "must be regarded as owned by the Crown and administered by the Transport Commission as Crown agents," and that the house, "being now Crown property, is no longer within the scope of the Rent Acts." He, accordingly, made an order for possession.

It is, of course, a settled rule that the Crown is not bound by a statute unless there can be gathered from it an intention that the Crown should be bound, and it has been held that, under this rule, the Crown and its servants and agents are not bound by the Rent Restrictions Acts : see, for instance, Territorial Forces Assocn. v. Nichols (1). In considering whether any subordinate body is entitled to this Crown privilege the question is not so much whether it is an "emanation of the Crown," a phrase which was first used in Gilbert v. Trinity House Corpn. (2), but whether it is properly to be regarded as the servant or agent of the Crown : see International Ry. Co. v. Niagara Parks Commission (3). In the case of the British Transport Commission, this depends on the true construction of the Transport Act, 1947. We have considered the provisions of that statute and, for the sake of clarity, we propose to state their effect without referring to the various sections in detail.

The Transport Act, 1947, brings into being the British Transport Commission, which is a statutory corporation of a kind comparatively new to English law. It has many of the qualities which belong to corporations of other kinds to which we have been accustomed. It has, for instance, defined powers which it cannot exceed, and it is directed by a group of men whose duty it is to see that those powers are properly used. It may own property, carry on business, borrow and lend money, just as any other corporation may do, so long as it keeps within the bounds which Parliament has set, but the significant difference in this corporation is that there are no shareholders to subscribe the capital or to have any voice in its affairs. The money which the corporation needs is raised, not by the issue of shares, but by borrowing, and its borrowing is not secured by debentures, but is guaranteed by the Treasury. If it cannot repay, the loss falls on the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, that is to say, on the taxpayer. There are no shareholders to elect the directors or to fix their remuneration. There are no profits to be made or distributed. The duty of the corporation is to make revenue and expenditure balance one another, taking, of course, one year with another, but not to make profits. If it should make losses and be unable to pay its debts, its property is liable to execution, but it is not liable to be wound-up at the suit of any creditor. The taxpayer would, no doubt, be expected to come to its rescue before the creditors stepped in. Indeed, the taxpayer is the universal guarantor of the corporation. But for him it could not have acquired its business at all, nor could it now continue it for a single day. It is his guarantee that has rendered shares, debentures and such like all unnecessary. He is clearly entitled to have his interest protected against extravagance or mismanagement.

There are other persons who have also a vital interest in its affairs. All those who use the services which it provides—and who does not—and all whose supplies depend on it—in short, everyone in the land—is concerned in seeing that it is properly run. The protection of the interests of all these—taxpayer, user and beneficiary—is entrusted by Parliament to the Minister of Transport. He is given powers over this corporation which are as great as those possessed by a man who holds all the shares in a private company, subject, however, as such a man is not, to a duty to account to Parliament for his stewardship. It is the Minister who appoints the directors—the members of the commission—and fixes their remuneration. They must give him any information he wants, and, lest they should not prove amenable to his suggestions as to the policy they should adopt, he is given power to give them directions of a general nature in matters which appear to him to affect the national interest, as to which he is the sole judge, and they are then bound to obey. These are great powers, but still we cannot regard the corporation A as being his agent, any more than a company is the agent of the shareholders or even of a sole shareholder. In the eye of the law the corporation is its own master and is answerable as fully as any other person or corporation. It is not the Crown and has none of the immunities or privileges of the Crown. Its servants are not civil servants, and its property is not Crown property. It is as much bound by Acts of Parliament as any other subject of the King. B It is, of course, a public authority and its purposes, no doubt, are public purposes, but it is not a government department nor do its powers fall within the province of government.

The correctness of these views is shown by the way in which the railways have been dealt with. Apart from the special provisions as to the constitution of the commission, all that has happened is that there has been an amalgamation C of the previous railway companies into one concern which is expressly made subject to the same rights and liabilities as the railway companies were, including statutory duties, contractual obligations, and even some customary obligations. This one amalgamated concern is run by a statutory corporation called the Railway Executive, but this corporation is nothing more nor less than the agent of the commission. So far as third persons are concerned, the D Railway Executive is treated as running the railways on its own account. For instance, the officers and servants of the former companies are treated as officers and servants of the Railway Executive and not of the commission, but in the last resort it is the commission which is responsible. If a judgment against the Railway Executive is not satisfied, execution can be levied against the property of the commission. All this seems to be quite inconsistent with E the notion that the commission is itself a government department or an agent of the Crown. Execution is not leviable against a government department, even under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947.

We do not find it very useful to draw analogies from other bodies which are differently constituted and differently controlled and exist for different purposes. The Territorial Army Association, for instance, is not concerned F with commercial matters, but with the defence of the realm, which is essentially the province of government, and it is, therefore, to be considered an agent of the Crown : Territorial Forces Assocn. v. Philpot (4) ; Territorial Forces Assocn. v. Nichols (1). The Post Office is the nearest analogy. It is, of course, concerned with commercial matters, but it is, nevertheless, a government department and its servants are civil servants. That is, however, an anomaly due to its G history. The carriage of mail was a Crown monopoly long before the Postmaster-General was incorporated. But the carriage of passengers and goods is a commercial concern which has never been the monopoly of anyone and we do not think that its unification under State control is any ground for conferring Crown privileges on it.

The only fact in this case which can be said to make the British Transport H Commission a servant or agent of the Crown is the control over it which is exercised by the Minister of Transport, but there is ample authority both in this court and the House of Lords for saying that such control as he exercises is insufficient for the purpose : see Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic) v. Cannon Brewery Co. (5) [1918] 2 Ch. 123, and [1919] A.C. 757. When Parliament intends that a new corporation should act on behalf of the Crown, it, as a rule, says so expressly, as it did in the case of the Central Land Board by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, which was passed on the same day as the Transport Act, 1947. In the absence of any such express provision, the proper inference, in the case, at any rate, of a commercial corporation, is that it acts on its own behalf, even though it is controlled by a government department.

In our opinion, therefore, the British Transport Commission is not a servant or agent of the Crown and its property is as much subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts as the property of any other person. Counsel for the defendant mentioned a further point, namely, whether in any case the plaintiff, who was clearly not the servant or agent of the Crown, could avail himself of the rule relating to the Crown, but it was not argued and we express no opinion on it. The appeal is allowed, and the case remitted to be dealt with on the footing that the house is within the Rent Restrictions Acts.

Appeal allowed with costs usual in the case of a poor person.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), June 30, July 1, 4, 5, 6, 1949.]

Adultery—Condonation—Revival—Conduct not amounting to legal cruelty.

The parties were married in 1942, and in 1944 a child was born. In 1945 the husband, who was serving in the Royal Air Force, went to Norway and there committed an isolated act of adultery. In 1946, after his return to the matrimonial home, he confessed this adultery to his wife, and she forgave him. In 1948 the wife presented a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty and the adultery which, she claimed, had been revived. The Court of Appeal found that the charge of cruelty was not proved, and, on the second point, Held: while the commission by a respondent of a matrimonial offence less than legal cruelty is sufficient to revive condoned adultery, the conduct complained of must be such as, if persisted in, will make married life together impossible; there was no evidence that the conduct of the husband in the present case was of such a character; and the wife, therefore, was not entitled to a decree.

APPEAL by the wife from a decision of Mr. Commissioner BLANCO WHITE, K.C., on Mar. 18, 1949, whereby he dismissed the wife's petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty and adultery. He found that cruelty was not proved, and that the adultery, which had been condoned, had not revived. The Court of Appeal upheld his decision.

I. H. Jacob for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Commissioner BLANCO WHITE, K.C., dismissing a petition by a wife on the ground of the husband's cruelty.

The points raised on the appeal are two :—(i) that the learned commissioner was wrong in finding that there had been no cruelty by the husband ; (ii) that, even if that point failed, nevertheless, the conduct of the husband had been such as to revive the adultery which he admittedly committed on a single occasion in Norway. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, found that the husband had not treated the wife with cruelty, and continued :] As regards the second point, it is said by counsel for the wife that Beard v. Beard (1) in effect decided that something short of actual cruelty would revive the condoned adultery. It is clear that Beard v. Beard (1) not only decided that desertion would revive adultery, a different kind of matrimonial misconduct, but also that there need not be such misconduct as would in itself be a basis for a petition, because in Beard v. Beard (1) the desertion which revived the adultery was for less than the statutory three years. It is said, therefore, by counsel for the wife that it is not necessary to prove cruelty in a case of this kind, but something short of cruelty will revive the adultery. The question is how far short it can be. A number of expressions are used in Beard v. Beard (1) on that point. SCOTT, L.J., said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 308) :

> " . . . the test to be applied has seemed to depend on the meaning of a particular judicial phrase, 'matrimonial offence,' used in certain reported cases, rather than on the basic reasons of principle which underlie the controversy. It is said by the one side that 'matrimonial offence' means only such a breach of matrimonial duty as will entitle and, perhaps require the Divorce Court to grant a decree to the aggrieved spouse ; and that no degree of matrimonial breach of duty, short of what calls for such a decree, can constitute a 'matrimonial offence' within the meaning of the decisions. Their argument is based on the contention that the word 'offence' correctly construed carries their meaning. The other side reply that the word 'offence' has no statutory force, and is merely a word used compendiously in the cases to cover any matrimonial wrongdoing, whether any decree could or could not be based on the particular wrongdoing in fact established. The dispute has thus seemed to turn on a problem of interpreting a judicial phrase. I think the broader viewpoint is the sounder and that it would be fallacious to limit the argument of principle by any such verbal and restrictive interpretation of a convenient judicial phrase."

If I apply those sentences to the present case, I have to ask myself : Did the conduct of the husband amount to a matrimonial wrongdoing ? Then I have to ask myself : What is a matrimonial wrongdoing ? It is a very broad phrase. If I look further at the cases to which the learned Lord Justice refers, I find several sentences which throw some light on the matter. A little later on SCOTT, L.J., said this (ibid., 310) :

> "If on the other hand those courts treated it as only conditional forgiveness of the guilty party, that is to say, as being granted upon a condition imposed by the law of the court, that the married status so preserved might again be lost if the forgiven spouse again broke his or > her marriage vows and became guilty of new matrimonial misconduct, then we too ought to treat the word in s. 30 of the [Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857] as connoting only a conditional wiping out of the offence condoned, which would revive on the happening of the new misconduct."

The phrases "matrimonial wrongdoing," "matrimonial misconduct," and "a breach of the marriage vows," throw some light on it, but not so much light as one would like. In earlier cases a different phrase is used, namely, "conjugal kindness." The learned Lord Justice quotes the words of Sir John Nicholl, Dean of Arches, in Durant v. Durant (2). Sir John said (1 Hag. Ecc. 762:

> "The plainer reason and the good sense of the implied condition is, that 'you shall not only abstain from adultery, but shall in future treat me—in every respect treat me (to use the words of the law)—"with conjugal kindness" . . .'".

Thus we have to consider what amounts to conjugal kindness, and whether the husband in this case committed a breach of it.

Finally, there is a judgment of Sir Francis Jeune, P., in Houghton v. Houghton (3) where he said ([1903] P. 152) :

> "The principle is as clear as possible. When the law speaks of condonation and revival, it means that the offence is condoned on the condition that there shall be in the future a proper compliance with the matrimonial decencies and duties, and a person who goes back to live with his or her guilty spouse goes back on that implied condition alone. Desertion is as serious a matrimonial offence as can be imagined, because it probably results in breaking up the matrimonial home."

Therefore, one finds a great number of expressions of dealing with the kind of offence which will revive condoned adultery. The matter must be approached with some care because I cannot believe that, if adultery has been condoned, say for seven years, a wife is entitled to say it is revived because the husband has on one occasion slapped her face, or has come home drunk, or has done something else which may amount to matrimonial misconduct or a breach of conjugal kindness. I think that the proper test to apply is—and I think it is rather indicated in the words of Sir Francis Jeune, P., to which I have just referred—that the conduct at any rate must be such as, if persisted in, will make married life together impossible. That is putting it as broadly as I can. A matrimonial offence, seems to me to mean an offence against the vows of marriage. The vows of marriage are well known. Desertion is certainly one offence, and cruelty as defined by the law is another. The conduct of the wife in Russell v. Russell (4), though it did not amount to cruelty, made married life impossible and the result was the refusal of a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. If I apply that test in this case and ask myself : Are the various complaints which counsel for the wife has put forward as breaches of conjugal kindness such as to make life between husband and wife impossible, or tend to make it impossible, my answer is : No, they were not. The marriage in fact broke up because the father turned the husband out of the house. Why he turned him out of the house was never explained to the husband. The husband was under the impression he was turned out because the wife had broken her pledge of secrecy and told her parents about her husband's act of adultery. According to the wife the husband was turned out because she complained of his sexual demands. At any rate, it was not the husband who left the wife willingly. It was the father who turned him out. Therefore, this second point fails, and the adultery was not revived by any conduct of the husband. I think the judgment of the learned commissioner was right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. If a husband should commit adultery and the wife should take him back, then in order to revive the condoned adultery it is not necessary that the fresh conduct of the guilty husband should be such as of itself to be a sufficient ground for a judicial separation or a divorce. A good deal less is sufficient. After all, the innocent wife does a praiseworthy thing in taking back the guilty husband, and should not be penalised for so doing. If the guilty husband after being taken back does not behave properly, and the marriage breaks down afresh by reason of his conduct without any fault of the innocent wife, she is entitled to rely on his original guilty act as a ground for divorce. Any other view would greatly hamper attempts at reconciliation, for no innocent party would be inclined to take a guilty party back if it meant being tied for ever to an unhappy marriage. The subsequent conduct may consist of harshness of behaviour short of cruelty, but if it breaks up the marriage that is sufficient to revive the adultery. That was made clear by SIR WILLIAM SCOTT in D'Aquilar v. D'Aquilar (5) where he said (1 Hag. Ecc. 782) :

> " It is held that words of heat and passion, of incivility, or reproach, are not alone sufficient for an original cause ; nor harshness of behaviour ; but I cannot but think that their operation would be stronger in condonation."

That passage was quoted (1 Hag. Ecc. 765) and accepted by SIR JOHN NICHOLL as good law in Durant v. Durant (2). He put the matter in his own words thus (ibid., 762) :

> " The plainer reason and the good sense of the implied condition is, that ' you shall not only abstain from adultery, but shall in future treat me —in every respect treat me (to use the words of the law)—" with conjugal kindness "—on this condition I will overlook the past injuries you have done me ' ".

He would be a bold man who would doubt the authority of those two great judges on this subject. SCOTT, L.J., in Beard v. Beard (1) clearly accepted them as authoritative, and I do the same. In the result, therefore, harshness, or neglect of a real and substantial kind which is such as to be likely to inflict misery on the innocent party and does indeed lead to a breakdown of the marriage, is sufficient to revive the original offence.

Applying this test, I confess I have felt considerable hesitation in the course of this case as to whether the husband's conduct on his own admission was not sufficient to revive the condoned adultery. He was on some occasions selfish and inconsiderate, and made remarks which were hurtful to a woman of the wife's sensitive temperament. It is an undoubted fact that her health greatly deteriorated. If the judge had found that the husband's conduct was the cause of the breakdown of the marriage, the condoned adultery would, I think, have been revived, but the judge has not so found. There are significant incidents which may also throw light on the breakdown of the marriage such as the wife receiving repeated telephone messages from another man. The judge has found that the husband is a very decent and respectable man. As I read the whole judgment the burden of it is that the husband's conduct was not the cause of the breakdown of the marriage. On that view of the facts it was not sufficient to revive the condoned adultery, and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed : no order as to costs.

[Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division (His Honour Judge Done), May 20, June 3, 1949.]

Adultery—Evidence—Entry in register of births—Birth of child registered as illegitimate—Register signed by reputed father.

A husband who petitioned for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery produced as the only evidence of adultery a certified copy of an entry in a register of births showing that his wife had registered the birth of an illegitimate child and that a person bearing the same name as the co-respondent had acknowledged paternity by signing the register as the father of the child.

Held : (i) a wife's declaration made when registering the birth of her child that her husband is not the father is not receivable in evidence either as evidence of that fact or as an admission of adultery, and, therefore, in the absence of other evidence, the certificate produced by the husband could not be accepted as proof of the wife's adultery.

Undefended Petition for divorce by husband on the ground of his wife's adultery.

The husband, the only witness called, relied for proof of the adultery on the certified copy of the entry of the birth of a child born to his wife signed in her handwriting in the original register as the mother and giving as the name of the father that of the man who was cited as co-respondent. The husband identified his wife's signature, but could not swear that the signature of the person who acknowledged the paternity of the child was that of the co-respondent. Holding that such evidence was insufficient to establish adultery, the learned commissioner granted an adjournment to permit the husband to tender further evidence.

Jupp for the husband.

The wife and the co-respondent did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3. His Honour JUDGE DONE (sitting as a commissioner in divorce) read the following judgment. In this undefended suit the husband petitions for dissolution on the ground of adultery. The marriage took place on Sept. 9, 1933. The husband, who was the only witness called, said that during the war he was in the Royal Air Force and served overseas from 1942 until April, 1945, when he returned to this country. He found his wife changed. She said she had no time for him and was in love with an American whom she refused to give up. That man was not the co-respondent. In August, 1945, the husband was demobilised. He worked for a time at Eynsham, where his wife refused to live with him. Later, he rejoined the Royal Air Force, in which he is still serving. He had continued to visit his wife. On several visits in 1945 he saw a man named Simpson at the house. It did not appear from the evidence that the man was staying there. The husband also saw him in company with the wife in the street on five or six occasions. The husband did not speak to Simpson, but he asked his wife about him. She said he was just a friend and denied having committed adultery with him. The husband put in a certified copy of the entry of the birth of a child and proved that the signature " F. H. Perring, mother " in col. 7 of the original register was in the handwriting of the wife. The entry records the birth of a boy on Jan. 7, 1948, the wife thus being named as the mother and Reginald Leonard Simpson, wood merchant, as the father. The petition alleges adultery with Reginald Leonard Simpson between April, 1947, and January, 1948, at Coxmoor Cottages, Crondall, Farnham, which is the address of the wife as given in the birth certificate.

It is clear that, apart from the birth certificate, there was no evidence of adultery and this was conceded by the husband's counsel. His submission was that the declaration made by the wife to the registrar that she had given birth to a child and that R. L. Simpson was the father of that child amounted to an admission of adultery, that the declaration was receivable in evidence as such an admission, and that on that sole evidence the court could, and should, grant a decree. He relied on Warren v. Warren (1), Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell (2), Mayo v. Mayo (3). His submission was that, if a wife is proved to have registered the birth of her child in a form appropriate to illegitimacy, no further evidence is required in order to entitle the husband to a divorce. The point is one of some importance and I took time to consider my decision.

I will first refer to the relevant provisions of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874. Section 1 imposes a duty on the father and mother, and in default of them on the occupier of the house where the child is born and on each person present at the birth and on the person having charge of the child, to give the registrar within 42 days after the birth information of the particulars required to be registered and in the presence of the registrar to sign the register. Section 7 says :

> " In the case of an illegitimate child no person shall, as father of such child, be required to give information under this Act concerning the birth of such child, and the registrar shall not enter in the register the name of any person as father of such child, unless at the joint request of the mother and of the person acknowledging himself to be the father of such child, and such person shall in such case sign the register, together with the mother."

Section 39 provides that the parent of any child who fails to give information concerning the birth of the child as required by the Acts shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings. Section 40 provides that any person who wilfully gives false information to the registrar concerning any birth shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £10. By s. 38 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, as amended by s. 38 of the Act of 1874, a sealed certified copy of an entry in the register of births shall be received as evidence of the birth to which the same relates without any further or other proof of such entry, provided the entry is signed by a person professing to be the informant and to be such a person as is required by law to give the registrar information concerning such birth. Under the statutory form the informant is required to state (a) the fact of the birth, giving date, place, name (if any) and sex, and (b) the parentage of the child. Thus, under ss. 1 and 7 of the Act of 1874 in the case of an illegitimate child the mother must inform the registrar of the illegitimacy, and column 4 (name of father) must be left blank unless the father attends and acknowledges paternity and both parents ask for his name to be inserted, as was done in this case. It was held ([1904] P. 140) by Sir Francis Jeune, P., in In the Estate of Goodrich (4) that a birth certificate is " evidence of what the Act requires to be stated." I infer from this that production of the certificate would not be evidence that a person named therein as father of a child registered as illegitimate was in fact the father.

Coming now to counsel's submissions, I ask first : Does the registration of the birth in the form in which it was effected by the respondent necessarily involve an admission by her that she had committed adultery ? The answer must be " yes." The entry records a belief on her part, and an expression of that belief, that R. L. Simpson is the father of her child. I use the word " belief " because on the evidence before the court it must be assumed that the husband had access to his wife at about the time when the child was conceived and may be the father. In law he is presumed to be the father, but the wife's belief is sufficient to found an admission. As Sir Boyd Merriman, P., put it in Roast v. Roast (5), if a wife uses language expressing a doubt whether her husband was the father, that is an admission that some other man had had sexual intercourse with her at the material time. The crucial question is whether such an admission can be proved by merely putting in a birth certificate and identifying the wife's signature as informant. Goddard, L.J., giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Ettenfield v. Ettenfield (6) said ([1940] 1 All E.R. 301) :

> " The rule that evidence tending to bastardise or legitimise a child conceived and born during wedlock cannot be given by either spouse is absolute . . ."

I refer also to the following passages in the speech of Viscount Finlay in Russell v. Russell (7). The rule, he says ([1924] A.C. 706) :

> " . . . applies to declarations on the subject of the paternity of the child made by the husband or the wife out of court just as much as to evidence given in court."

He cites (ibid., 707) Lord Mansfield's observation in Goodright v. Moss (8) that " the declarations of a father or mother, cannot be admitted to bastardise the issue born after marriage " ; and adds (ibid., 708) that the expression " ' bastardise the issue . . .' merely denotes giving evidence to show that the child is illegitimate . . ." He refers to The Aylesford Peerage (9), and to Lord Bramwell's acceptance of a proposition put forward by Mr. Horace Davey, K.C., in these terms ([1924] A.C. 714) :

> " It is clear upon the authorities that the mother not only could not be called to state the fact who the father of the child was, but could not be asked any collateral questions tending to prove or disprove that fact, for the rule extends equally to such collateral questions."

The actual decision in Russell v. Russell (7) was that these principles, long established in legitimacy cases, applied also in divorce proceedings.

It is clear from the authorities that the wife could not have been called to prove that R. L. Simpson was the father of the child. It is, in my view, also clear that the declaration to that effect made by the wife when registering the birth is equally inadmissable, both as a statement of paternity and as tending to show that the child was illegitimate.

In The Aylesford Peerage (9) the wife's letters containing (inter alia) admissions as to the paternity of the child were admitted, not as evidence of the paternity, but as part of the res gestae, i.e., the fact that she wrote such letters had its place in the history of the conduct of the parties. Assuming, but without deciding, that the registration of a birth in pursuance of a statutory obligation could come within that principle, in the present case I find no evidence of any course of conduct to which the registration could attach. There is nothing in the husband's evidence to show that the relations of the wife with the man Simpson of whom he spoke were of any significance, and there is no evidence to identify that man with the R. L. Simpson of the certificate. Of the latter nothing is known except what appears in the certificate and there is only the wife's statement as to that. The certificate does not make it evidence.

The first case on which counsel for the husband relied in support of his submission that the declaration as to paternity in the birth certificate was admissible was Warren v. Warren (1). In that case a wife made admissions verbally to her husband and to another man and in certain letters that she had committed adultery and was pregnant in consequence. It was held that the admissions of adultery, although accompanied by statements of her belief that the expected child was the result of the adultery, were admissible in evidence on the ground that they could not bastardise the child without evidence of non-access by the husband. SWIFT, J., says at the conclusion of his judgment ([1925] P. 113) :

> " I do not accept her guess or opinion that the child . . . was not her husband's . . . I hold that the evidence of the statements made by the respondent to the petitioner and to Mr. Charles Warren and the confessions in her letters are true in substance and in fact. On that evidence I believe that the respondent committed adultery . . ."

The birth certificate had been put in, showing that the wife had registered the birth without naming a father, but it is to be observed that SWIFT, J., makes no reference to it in his judgment and does not include it among the admissions of adultery on which he states that his judgment is based.

In Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell (2), HODSON, J., applied the principle of Warren v. Warren (1) to a case where the wife's admission, made to the husband and to two other persons, stated that the co-respondent was the father of her expected child. HODSON, J., said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 306) :

> " . . . it does not make any difference in principle whether she simply says ' I have committed adultery ' or says ' I am pregnant by another man ' . . . no question of non-access or non-intercourse arises in this case, and no attempt has been made to bastardise the child."

The birth certificate was apparently not put in and no reference to it appears in the report. Rimmer v. Rimmer (10), in my view, bears much more directly on the point which I have to decide. The wife had obtained a decree and the King's Proctor intervened alleging adultery on her part. HILL, J., gave a considered judgment, the material part of which is as follows (144 L.T. 97) :

> " The King's Proctor tendered in evidence a statutory declaration made by the wife preceding a rectification of the birth register, deleting the husband's name as father of the child. Any statement by the wife in the original registration that the husband was not the father would not have been admissible in evidence. Her actual declaration is equally inadmissible. It was contended that I could admit that declaration as a confession of adultery and reject it as a declaration of paternity, under the authority of Warren v. Warren (1). But if I reject all which relates to the paternity > of the child I have nothing left except certain words in the declaration for rectification into which I cannot read an admission of adultery."

The learned judge held that there was no admissible evidence of adultery and dismissed the intervention. As I read that case, Hill, J., after considering Warren v. Warren (1), held that a wife's declaration, made when registering the birth, that her husband was not the father of her child is not receivable in evidence either as evidence of that fact or as an admission of adultery. I respectfully follow that decision, which, in my view, gives due effect to the principles to which I have referred earlier in this judgment. A statement by a wife whether made in or out of court that her husband either is or is not the father of her child is not admissible in evidence, and being inadmissible is not available (in the second alternative) as proof of an admission of adultery.

In Warren v. Warren (1) evidence was given of a series of admissions of adultery which were unqualified, but to each of which was appended a statement that the woman was pregnant as the result of the adultery. Swift, J., rejected the appendage and acted on the admissions. In the present case there is nothing but a declaration which corresponds to the statement which Swift, J., rejected, and on which he did not rely as an admission. But Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell (2) went further. There the wife's statements were that she was pregnant and that Bushell was the father of the expected child. The admission of pregnancy was not per se an admission of adultery ; it only became such when Bushell was named as father. The petitioner, therefore, had to rely on the statement as to paternity, and this was held admissible. Rimmer v. Rimmer (10) was not cited. I do not find myself able to reconcile Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell (2) with the principle that a spouse is prohibited from giving evidence as to the paternity of a child conceived and born during wedlock —a prohibition which is not limited to the case where the evidence might tend to bastardise the child. If, as I think, there is a conflict between the decisions in the Rimmer (10) and the Frampton (2) cases, I prefer to follow the former.

I was also referred to Mayo v. Mayo (3), a decision of Mr. Commissioner Blanco White, K.C. There the wife, when registering the birth of her child, omitted to give the name of the father. It was held that the entry in the register constituted an admission of adultery and was admissible in evidence as such. In the course of his judgment the learned commissioner said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 870) :

> "It is not to be assumed that she would fail to comply with her duty [i.e., to enter the name and description of the father]. She did not enter the name and surname of the father, and that must mean, if one assumes she is doing her duty, either that she did not know who the father was . . . or she was admitting that the child was illegitimate. Whichever view one takes following the decision in Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell (2), that is an admissible admission of adultery, and in so far as it is an expression of her opinion that the child is illegitimate the evidence is admissible under the rule in Russell v. Russell (7)."

That decision obviously bears directly on the point which I have to decide, but for the reasons which I have just given I find myself unable to follow it.

I hold that the declaration as to paternity made by the wife when registering the child's birth is not admissible in evidence and cannot be used as an admission of adultery in this suit. If I am wrong in this view it would be necessary to consider whether the court should grant a decree solely on the admission of the wife with no corroboration of any kind. Before acting on an admission the court would require to be satisfied of its truth. In this case there is nothing in the evidence (apart from the certificate) which throws any light on that question. On the other hand, there is a presumption that the wife did not commit a crime by wilfully giving false information to the registrar. It may, therefore, be assumed that she, at least, believed what she told him. On the whole, I think it would be right to grant a decree, but, for the reasons already given, I must find that adultery is not established.

Counsel for the petitioner then applied for leave to call further evidence and an adjournment was granted for that purpose.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), June 21, 22, 23, July 4, 1949.]

Cruelty—Defence—Insanity—Knowledge by respondent of nature and quality of acts.

A wife, while suffering from a disease of the mind, treated her husband with cruelty, and thereby caused injury to his health. On a petition by the husband for divorce on the ground of her cruelty, the wife, through the Official Solicitor as her guardian ad litem, pleaded that, owing to her mental illness, at all material times she did not know the nature and quality of her acts.

Held (by Bucknill and Asquith, L.JJ.) : if the disease of the mind was not such as to make the wife incapable of understanding what she was doing, or that her conduct was wrong, it afforded no defence to the charge of cruelty ; on the facts, the wife knew what she was doing and that she was doing wrong ; and, therefore the husband was entitled to a decree.

Rules in M'Naghten's Case (1843) (10 Cl. & Fin. 200) and dictum of Lord Esher, M.R., in Hanbury v. Hanbury (1892) (8 T.L.R. 560), applied.

Held (by Denning, L.J.) : a specific intent to injure was not an essential ingredient in cruelty, and, accordingly, it was no defence (unless, possibly, the injured party knew that the other was of unsound mind) to prove that the wife did not know the nature and quality of her acts or that what she was doing was wrong.

APPEAL by the husband from a judgment of HIS HONOUR JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., sitting as a commissioner in divorce, dated Jan. 10, 1949, whereby he dismissed the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's cruelty.

The learned commissioner found that the wife was suffering from disease of the mind at the time of the acts complained of, and, on his view that the proper D test of responsibility for acts of cruelty was whether there was some physical derangement which might explain cruel conduct, the defence of insanity succeeded. The husband appealed, and the Court of Appeal now allowed his appeal.

Cur. adv. vult. E

July 4. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment dated Jan. 10, 1949, of HIS HONOUR JUDGE ARCHER, sitting as a commissioner in divorce, dismissing the petition of the husband, John White, for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's cruelty. The parties were married F on Aug. 19, 1941. He was 30 and she was 24 years old. There is one child of the marriage born on May 21, 1945.

At the hearing of the petition the husband proved the following facts. He was in the army at the time of the marriage, and had only two or three days' leave with his wife. After his return to the regiment he was sent overseas and remained there for three years. G For some time his wife seemed quite happy, but in 1943 she wrote to him saying that she did not want to have anything more to do with him, but gave no reason. However, she wrote later and said everything was all right again, and continued to write to him until July, 1944, when her letters stopped. About a month before he had had an irrational letter from her, which appears to have been written at a time when she was suffering from a delusion that someone was going to "get her." H In September, 1944, he got compassionate leave to see his wife who was then living with her parents at Pinner. His wife did not seem to know him and ignored him when he went into the house, but she gradually got better. After he had been home a week or two he found two letters addressed to her from a man in the forces. They were very passionate letters, and he spoke to his wife about them. She told him to mind his own business and managed to get the letters back from him. There is no evidence as to the dates when they were written. They then settled down more or less happily as husband and wife, and at her request he obtained an extension of his leave. She then, without any justification, started to accuse her husband of going about with other women, including her own mother. On Dec. 19, 1944, she went as a voluntary patient to Shenley Hospital. While there she was found to be pregnant, and on Jan. 31, 1945, her husband took her out of the hospital to Bexhill where his parents lived and where he was arranging to make a home for her. She had her baby in a nursing home on May 21, 1945. Up to that time she seemed all right, but after her return from the nursing home, the husband said, "she started her tantrums. She would have nothing to do with me whatsoever. She would not live with me. Since about three months before the child was born I have had no intercourse with her." After she had come back from the nursing home she frequently accused him of infidelity and raved at him about it. This went on usually all the time, but there was an occasional break, perhaps, of a few days. She was all right when her father came to stay, much better then and more restrained altogether. In consequence of her treatment of her husband he became ill and had to have sick leave for several weeks. The wife neglected him, and eventually, because she refused to look after him, he left his home and went to stay with his parents for three or four months. The date when he left home was not fixed in evidence, but was probably in the spring of 1946. Meanwhile, the wife stayed in the matrimonial home, and he made her an allowance, and she was also earning money in employment as a receptionist to a chiropodist-osteopath. In October, 1946, the husband went back to his house to see the baby and also to get some clothes, and the wife refused him admission, attacked him, and started kicking and hitting him. A day or so afterwards she went back to Pinner to her parents, and the husband went back to the house on Nov. 3. He found she had not paid certain bills for which he had given her the money. He wrote to her about it, and she then came back to Bexhill in a rage, attacked and scratched him on the back of the head, and used very obscene language. The husband fetched two policemen and she was then slightly quieter, but still violent. The husband went up to his room and locked himself in. Early the following morning he went downstairs to the kitchen, where she was sleeping on the sofa, and made tea and gave her a cup, but she immediately threw it at him. The husband, who was a postman, went off to work, but on his return she attacked him with a chair. This went on during the month of November. She behaved in this sort of way nearly every time when he came in from work. He locked himself in his bedroom nearly every night. About this time he developed chicken-pox, and when he told his wife she said he had got it because he had been out with filthy women. When he told her that he would have to stop in for about ten days, she replied : "You are not going to stop here." Accordingly, he finally left the house at the end of November, 1946, and went to live with his parents. His wife often told him that she wanted a divorce and wanted to be finished with him altogether. The wife behaved well when other people besides the husband were present and made no complaint about him to them.

In April, 1947, the wife summoned her husband for desertion, persistent cruelty and wilful neglect to maintain, but the hearing was adjourned for three months on the husband consenting to pay her an allowance of £1 a week. In July, 1947, the husband filed this petition. On Dec. 18, 1947, the wife was certified as a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment, and was received into Shenley Mental Hospital. On Sept. 18, 1948, the Official Solicitor, on behalf of the wife, filed an answer denying the cruelty, and, alternatively, pleading that, if she had been guilty of the alleged acts, she did not know the nature and quality of any of the said acts and asked for the petition to be dismissed. In addition to the evidence of the husband, a neighbour, Mrs. Saul, who lived next door to the husband and his wife from March, 1945, gave evidence. She said that the husband and his wife seemed quite normal and happy at first. The wife gave Mrs. Saul the impression that she was a neurotic. Two or three months after the birth of the baby trouble started between the husband and his wife. She raved at him when he came home. " She had conceived a bitter hatred of him and that is as plain as I can say it," said Mrs. Saul, and that showed itself whenever he came in at night and there was nobody else in the house. Dr. Dick, a medical practitioner at Bexhill, gave evidence as to the husband's ill-health in 1945 and 1946. He also attended the wife in May, 1945, before the birth of the child, and afterwards. Her behaviour in his presence before the birth of the child was perfectly normal, and she did not show any signs of unbalance to him. He also saw her after the confinement about herself and about her child. She told the doctor she wanted a divorce from her husband and to be rid of him and complained about his carrying on with other women. Dr. Dick told her that there was no foundation in these charges, but that made no difference in her attitude towards her husband. Throughout she showed no signs of insanity to Dr. Dick. She looked after her baby very well and took an interest in her health and was very neat, and she was always perfectly controlled in his (Dr. Dick's) presence. He saw her in June, 1947, for the purpose of seeing whether there was anything wrong with her mentally. She knew perfectly well what she was doing. She still kept on the one thing, that what she wanted was a divorce from her husband. Dr. Dick said : " Her one idea in life all along since I knew her was to have a divorce from him, because she hated the sight of him. On that point she had an obsession." In all her dealings with her husband she seemed to know exactly what she was doing. Apart from her allegations against her husband, Dr. Dick saw no sign of any hallucination or delusion. She was excitable and temperamental, but not unbalanced to a degree. The last time he saw her was in September, 1947, when she was in hospital for an operation on her foot.

On behalf of the wife the only witness was Dr. FitzGerald, the medical superintendent of Shenley Hospital. He first saw the wife at a psychiatric clinic in June, 1944, when her husband was serving overseas. He advised the wife's mother, who brought her there, that the wife should be placed in institutional care, that he very much feared she would have to be certified, and that the appropriate thing was to notify the relieving officer. The wife's parents, however, only told the husband that she was very ill and when he came home he lived with his wife and she then became pregnant. The wife was received into Dr. FitzGerald's mental hospital as a rate-aided patient on Dec. 19, 1944. In Dr. FitzGerald's opinion she was then suffering from schizophrenia, had a delusion of antipathy for her husband, and was in a condition in which she might have been certified as a person of unsound mind, a condition which did not show any improvement before she left on Jan. 31, 1945. Dr. FitzGerald advised the husband to take his wife home because he felt she might as well be at home and it would be an advantage to the child to be born in home surroundings. Nearly three years later, i.e., on Dec. 18, 1947, she was admitted to his hospital as one certified " as a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment." On Jan. 17, 1948, she was discharged to a relative. Dr. FitzGerald said that, having regard to the whole course of the wife's illness, it was probable that during the interval of three years between her first and second admission to his hospital her mental condition was the same as during the time when she was in hospital. It did not surprise Dr. FitzGerald that the wife was earning her own living during this period, but it certainly surprises me when one looks at the certificate of Dec. 18, 1947, to see what were the facts indicating insanity on which the certifying doctor formed his conclusion. They are as follows :

> " She had bizarre hypochondrical ideas, e.g., that something had entered her stomach and caused her to lose her grip on it, and that she should have > an operation on her foot in case she met another man. Most of her speech was rambling and indirect."

He, Dr. FitzGerald, also said that the case seemed to have some curious features in that the wife was not violent while she was in hospital although a patient suffering from schizophrenia is very frequently violent and has outbursts of impulsive violence. He said he would have regarded the wife as not being a responsible person, and by that he meant that he would not regard her as a fit person to give directions regarding her monetary affairs and did not consider her capable of forming accurate judgments, but he would not say that she did not know what she was doing. He also said that a person who is mentally abnormal to such a degree as the wife in this case is still quite capable of preserving a sense of social propriety, which explained why she was able to control her impulse to maltreat her husband when in company.

On this evidence the commissioner said that the sole issue in the case was whether the acts of alleged cruelty were attributable to insanity and that a person is not responsible for acts of insanity as the law understands that word. In his opinion, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Squire v. Squire (1), would have been different if the wife had been insane, and in support of his opinion he cited the words in the judgment of EVERSHED, L.J., in that case ([1948] 2 All E.R. 55) :

> "It is conceded that the wife, though her mind and judgment were distracted by the illnesses from which she had suffered, was not insane. She remained at all material times responsible for her actions."

The commissioner then considered the question whether the wife was really responsible for her actions and declined to apply as a test of that question the rule enunciated by the judges in M'Naghten's Case (2) in 1843 as the test of irresponsibility on the ground of insanity in criminal trials. The rule states (10 Cl. & Fin. 210) :

> ". . . to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing ; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong."

The commissioner said that it would be extremely perilous in a case of this kind to apply this test, because of the difficulty of determining what "knowing" really means. He considered that the proper test of responsibility was whether there was some physical derangement which might explain cruel conduct, conduct which differed to some extent from the average acts of normal mankind. "It is not right, it is not just," said the judge, "to impute to such a person things which only a normal person can have imputed to him." The commissioner then asked himself whether, on the evidence as a whole, the wife was responsible for her acts of cruelty. As I understand his judgment, in answering this question he applied the test whether the wife was normal, or had some mental derangement which made her abnormal. He accepted the evidence of the husband, whom he judged to be a thoroughly respectable young man and truthful. He said he was not impressed by the evidence of Dr. Dick because he ought to have known that the wife was certifiable when she was in the hospital for some five weeks at the end of 1944. With great respect to the learned judge, Dr. Dick was expressing his opinion as to the wife's normal mental state from what he saw of her as his patient. He did not see her until after she left the hospital in January, 1945, and had no knowledge of Dr. FitzGerald's opinion at that time. The learned commissioner relied on the evidence of Dr. FitzGerald. He explained the statement of Dr. FitzGerald that he did not deny that the wife may have known what she was doing when she was maltreating her husband by saying that Dr. FitzGerald was not thereby affirming that the wife was ever responsible for what she was doing. "They are two totally different things," the commissioner said. Towards the end of his judgment he said :

> "On the evidence I cannot conscientiously say that when this poor woman did these odd things she was ill, but she knew more or less what she was doing and she should have controlled herself, but the acts she did were, in fact, cruel, and it must be assumed that she intended the consequences of them. I think I should be very wrong if I did any such thing." A

I, therefore, understand the basis of the learned commissioner's decision to be that, although in his judgment the wife knew the nature of the acts which she was doing, her knowledge was based, not on a normal, but on a diseased, state of mind, and was not, therefore, knowledge in the usual sense of the words. B It seems clear that the commissioner considered that the test of insanity laid down in M'Naghten's Case (2) did not apply to this case. He said during the argument that, in his view, the judgment of Henn Collins, J., in Kellock v. Kellock (3), who applied the test in a petition for cruelty, was inconsistent with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Squire v. Squire (1).

The question, therefore, which we must decide is whether the rule laid down in C M'Naghten's Case (2), or some rule similar in principle to it, applies to a case of cruelty such as this. On behalf of the husband, counsel argued that the test whether the wife was responsible for her conduct towards her husband was the same in a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty as it would have been if the acts of cruelty had formed the basis of a criminal charge of injury to the husband, and that by the test laid down in M'Naghten's Case (2) she would have D been responsible because all the evidence showed she knew quite well the nature of her acts and that she knew what she was doing was wrong because she controlled herself at all times except when she was alone with her husband. On the other hand, counsel on behalf of the Official Solicitor, as guardian ad litem for the wife, argued that the rule in M'Naghten's Case (2) ought not to be extended to the case of a petition for divorce because the rule was now regarded by scientific E thought as unsatisfactory and harsh in that it did not take sufficient account of acts done by a man under some uncontrollable impulse, an impulse which was probably the product of some physical disorder of the brain.

The test of insanity in divorce cases was considered by Sir Charles Butt, P., in Hanbury v. Hanbury (4). In that case the wife prayed for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. The husband F in his answer alleged, inter alia, that, if he had committed the acts charged, he was of unsound mind at the time and incapable of understanding the nature of such acts, or their legal consequences. From the evidence it appeared that from 1881 the husband started to drink heavily, and from that time he was subject to attacks, variously described as delirium tremens or recurrent mania, coming on suddenly and without notice, during which he was extremely violent G and difficult to control and which led to his confinement from time to time in various asylums or retreats. During the intervals between the attacks he was admitted to be an amiable and well educated man. Much scientific evidence was called on behalf of the husband to show that he suffered from some disease of the mind, possibly hereditary, which produced these violent outbursts. The President, at the conclusion of the charge to the jury, put certain questions H to them, of which the last three were whether, when the husband committed any of the acts of cruelty and adultery charged against him, he was capable of understanding their nature and consequences. The jury found that, at the time the husband committed them, he was capable of understanding their nature and consequences, and the President then granted a decree nisi to the wife. On appeal (before Lord Esher, M.R., and Lindley and Kay, L.JJ.) counsel for the husband argued that the disease from which the husband was said to be suffering produced a craving for drink and that when the attacks came on the impulse to excess was uncontrollable. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal without calling on counsel for the wife. The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in the course of his judgment, said (8 T.L.R. 560) :

> " Assuming a diseased mind, and that the diseased mind gave him certain impulses—he would not call it an uncontrollable impulse, as he did not know what that meant in such a case as this—the respondent knew what he was doing, and that he was doing wrong. An act of adultery was a culpable act against the wife. He was prepared to lay down as the law of England that whenever a person did an act which was either a criminal or a culpable act, which act, if done by a person with a perfect mind, would make him civilly or criminally responsible to the law, if the disease in the mind of the person doing the act was not so great as to make him unable to understand the nature and consequences of the act which he was doing, that was an act for which he would be civilly or criminally responsible to the law. Consequently, even though the respondent's mind was diseased, he was as responsible to the law as if his mind was not diseased. The judgment of the learned PRESIDENT was therefore right."

The principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in that case was followed by HENN COLLINS, J., in Astle v. Astle (5). In that case HENN COLLINS, J., declined to accept the view that there is no degree of insanity that will afford an answer to a charge of cruelty in the Divorce Court, and continued ([1939] 3 All E.R. 970) :

> " If there be a degree of insanity which affords an answer to a matrimonial suit, how is it to be safely measured except by the test applied in all other courts ? "

The learned judge cited s. 2 (c) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, and said (ibid., 971) :

> " I emphasise the word ' treated,' because that seems to me to connote a conscious action, and appears to indicate an action of which the doer knows the nature and quality . . . I find that he knew he was uttering threats against his wife. Upon that view of the facts, he was responsible in law for what he then did."

In Kellock v. Kellock (3) HENN COLLINS, J., had to deal with another case of alleged cruelty by a spouse who pleaded insanity. In the course of his judgment he said that the respondent wife was suffering from a disease of the kind known as manic depressive insanity. He continued ([1939] 3 All E.R. 973) :

> " I have no doubt that the acts of the wife of which complaint is made were the outcome of disease of the mind, a disease which probably had its inception before marriage. At the same time, the medical evidence compels me to find . . . that the wife at all material times knew what she was doing, and that what she was doing was wrong."

On this conclusion the judge granted the husband a decree. In HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 21, p. 293, para. 504, it is stated :

> " In an action at common law or in Chancery, where the responsibility of a person alleged to be of unsound mind is in question, the issue generally directed is, ' Was the person alleged to be of unsound mind at the date in question capable of understanding the nature of the act he was performing ? ' "

Dealing with the facts of the case before us, it seems that the crucial question is the mental condition of the wife during the period from the time when she came home after the birth of her baby at the end of May, 1945, to the time when her husband left her and went to his parents about a year later. During this period there was no evidence of physical violence by the wife, but there was constant, unreasonable and loud nagging and accusations of infidelity which eventually injured the husband's health. If this conduct was due to some disease of the brain it is impossible to say when that disease started. It may have been present when the marriage took place, it may have been the product of some love affair while her husband was abroad, followed by marital intercourse, hateful to her, and the birth of her child, thereby producing conditions which so preyed on her mind as to produce impulses which she did not, and, perhaps, could not, control when alone with her husband. It may not have developed its full force until the time when she was certified. These are speculations to which there is no answer. If the wife deliberately behaved towards her husband in a way which was not in itself quite irrational in circumstances which indicated that she knew what she was doing and that her conduct was wrong and if that treatment had the natural result of injuring his health, then all the elements seem to me to be present to show that she treated him with cruelty.

It is not necessary in this case to express an opinion on the further point argued by counsel for the husband that the husband, for his own protection, would be entitled to a decree on the ground of cruelty although the wife did not know the nature and quality of the acts which were put forward as acts of cruelty. The point was mentioned by Sir Charles Butt, P., in his charge to the jury in Hanbury v. Hanbury (4), to which I have already referred, where he put forward the view that, if the husband suffered from madness of such a nature as to necessitate keeping him in duress for the rest of his life, there was no danger of violence to the wife, and, therefore, in such a case a plea of insanity might be an answer. On the other hand, if the madness is such as need not entail the permanent incarceration of the husband, but only his restraint from time to time, while it is of such a nature as will produce violence on his part and thereby endanger the safety of the wife, then in such a case a decree in favour of the wife might properly be made. He said ([1892] P. 224) :

> " I conceive that the object of the Divorce Act is not so much, or nearly so much, the punishment or retribution for a marital offence as the protection of the party who is in peril . . . In such a case I can well conceive that, although in some instances insanity may be one of those misfortunes which must be taken by a wife with her husband for better or for worse, and though it may assume the form of a disease, yet if it is such as to imperil the wife's safety she is entitled to the protection of this court. Assuming for a moment that these attacks were not brought on the respondent by his own self-indulgence, assuming that they were the result of hereditary disease, I should be still disposed to hold that acts of cruelty committed in one of these fits of mania would entitle the wife to the remedy which she asks—separation from her husband. If the mania is intermittent and recurrent, the husband is entitled to go home when he recovers from time to time—the wife cannot refuse him admission to the conjugal home ; and if the mania is likely to recur accompanied with violence which would place the wife in peril, the ordinary protection which she is supposed to obtain by proceedings in lunacy is a delusion, because it does not protect her against the return home of her husband, who is liable at any moment to become a lunatic."

On appeal Lord Esher, M.R., dealt with the question in this way. He said (8 T.L.R. 560) :

> " There was a larger question which the President touched upon, but did not decide—namely, whether, even if the respondent's mind had been such that he did not know the nature of what he was doing or that he was doing wrong, the petitioner would or would not be entitled to a divorce."

Lord Esher said it was unnecessary to decide that question, and he desired to leave it open. Henn Collins, J., in Astle v. Astle (5) decided against such a view, on the ground that it would introduce a measure of legal responsibility not applied to any other court. He said ([1939] 3 All E.R. 970) :

> " On the facts of this case the respondent could not be held answerable outside this court, either civilly or criminally, for his assaults, and it is therefore a very strong step to say that in this court, by those self same acts, he has done something which, in this court, is not only an offence, but may, and, indeed, must, since divorce is not a discretionary remedy, alter his civil status."

There seems to be much to say on either side of this difficult question. Without some considerable qualifications such a doctrine would in some cases lead to obviously unjust results. Since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Russell v. Russell (6) that a spouse in certain circumstances may defeat a petition for restitution of conjugal rights although he fails to prove legal cruelty, the danger to one spouse owing to the intermittent insanity of the other spouse may be removed to some extent. However, it is not necessary in this case to decide this difficult question, and I do not wish to express any opinion about it. I am in favour of allowing this appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. According to one view no type or degree of insanity can excuse acts which in a sane person would amount to cruelty. This view assumes that the sole object of granting matrimonial relief in cases of cruelty is the protection of the victim. The victim, so the argument runs, is just as much injured or imperilled by the acts of a mad spouse as by those of a sane one. The assumption involved receives only a qualified support from the authorities—for example, SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., in Hanbury v. Hanbury (4), speaks of the protection of the victim not as the sole object but as the " main object." But, apart from this, it leads, if pressed to its logical limits, to the conclusion that not merely is insanity of whatever kind on the part of the aggressor immaterial, but that no state of mind, intention or knowledge on his part can be relevant.

I have had the advantage and pleasure of reading in advance the judgment to be delivered by DENNING, L.J., to the effect that when the charge is one of cruelty insanity is never a defence except, perhaps, when its existence is known to the victim at the time of the acts complained of. With great respect I cannot go the whole way with my brother, nor, on the view I take of the facts, is it necessary to do so. The view he propounds has, in my opinion, never been distinctly affirmed in any decision binding on this court. In more than one case the court has deliberately left the point open, e.g., the Court of Appeal did so in Hanbury v. Hanbury (4) and the decision of this court in Squire v. Squire (1), though it decides nothing directly as to insanity, seems to me plainly to affirm that the state of mind of the aggressor is relevant to liability. That case decides that the intentional character of the aggressor's act is material, though its motive is not. Suppose the acts complained of by the petitioner consisted of blows struck by the respondent of a kind likely to cause severe pain. According to Squire v. Squire (1), as I read it, the respondent, to be found guilty of cruelty, must not only hit the petitioner, but hit the petitioner intentionally, and, therefore, must know he is hitting the petitioner. Squire v. Squire (1) decides that, while this much must at least be proved, it is not necessary to go further and prove that the respondent intended to cause pain and was animated by spite, for an agent is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts. I, therefore, am unable to accept the view that insanity can never be a defence, partly because that view rests on an assumption which, if valid, compels one logically to say that no state of mind on the part of the person charged with cruelty can be relevant to his liability, and I cannot believe that a man whose acts are completely automatic and unconscious, e.g., an epileptic in convulsions, can be guilty of "cruelty" in respect of such acts, partly because the assumption seems to me to be rejected by Squire v. Squire (1), partly because cruelty is still described as a matrimonial offence and, indeed, in respect of standard of proof, is now assimilated with a crime, and partly because the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, speaks of one spouse " treating " the other with cruelty, an unmeaning or inappropriate expression in the case of wholly unconscious or unintended action. In any event, if I am wrong and the protection of the victim is the sole criterion, such protection seems to be necessary whether or not the aggressor was known at the time to the victim to be insane. On the other hand, it is plain that the presence of insanity of some sort or other, without more, will not necessarily afford a defence.

What type or degree, therefore, of insanity will avail a spouse charged with cruelty ? The inference I draw from the authorities is that so to avail the insanity must, at all events, not fall short of such insanity as would afford a defence to a criminal charge within the M'Naghten rules. In other words, if the actor knows the " nature and quality of his acts " (that is to say, knows what he is doing and knows he is doing wrong), the fact that he is suffering from a disease of the mind is immaterial, even if he would not have committed the acts complained of but for such disease. It is unnecessary in the present case, having regard to the view I take of the facts, to decide whether the converse holds, namely, that, if the respondent does not know what he is doing, or does not know it is wrong, this is in any or every case a defence, though for myself I incline to that view. Certain authorities, one at least of which is binding on us, seem to me to assume the applicability of the M'Naghten rules, and I do not see any logic in applying them unreciprocally or by halves. These authorities are or include the following : Astle v. Astle (5) (as qualified by Squire v. Squire (1)) and Kellock v. Kellock (3), where HENN COLLINS, J., explicitly adopts the M'Naghten criterion both in its affirmative and negative applications. These decisions are entitled to great respect, but are not binding on this court. On the other hand, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hanbury v. Hanbury (4), is binding on us. In that case SIR CHARLES BUTT, P., in the court of first instance, had expressed the opinion that the criterion was whether the insane aggressor understood the "character and consequences" of the acts complained of. In the Court of Appeal, LORD ESHER, M.R., with whom the other two Lords Justices concurred, used the following language (8 T.L.R. 560) :

> " The jury found that the respondent knew what he was doing when he committed the acts, and understood their nature and consequences . . . The jury were perfectly entitled to come to the conclusion they did, and he thought that it was the only sensible conclusion at which they could have arrived. There remained a question of law. Assuming a diseased mind, and that the diseased mind gave him certain impulses—he would not call it an uncontrollable impulse, as he did not know what that meant in such a case as this—the respondent knew what he was doing, and that he was doing wrong. An act of adultery was a culpable act against the wife. He was prepared to lay down as the law of England that whenever a person did an act which was either a criminal or a culpable act, which act, if done by a person with a perfect mind, would make him civilly or criminally responsible to the law, if the disease in the mind of the person doing the act was not so great as to make him unable to understand the nature and consequences of the act which he was doing, that was an act for which he would be civilly or criminally responsible to the law. Consequently, even though the respondent's mind was diseased, he was as responsible to the law as if his mind was not diseased."

In this passage the MASTER OF THE ROLLS uses three formulae : (1) knew what he is doing, when he did the acts, and understood their nature and consequences ; (2) knew what he was doing, and that he was doing wrong ; (3) able to understand the nature and consequences of the act he was doing. It is patent that he treats all of these formulae so far as knowledge of what one is doing goes as interchangeable. It is further clear that he had in mind the M'Naghten rules as the criterion. Under these rules a person charged with a crime cannot repel the presumption of sanity and his consequent responsibility for his acts unless he can show that he did not know the " nature and quality of his acts," or, knowing this, did not know he was doing wrong. Juries are apt, unless this formulae is paraphrased or explained, to suppose that the " nature " of an act and its " quality " are different things (a fallacy, for, as held by the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Codere (7) (12 Cr. App. Rep. 27), they are, in fact, synonyms). The time honoured phrase employed to obviate this error is that the accused must show either that he did not know what he was doing, or did not know he was doing wrong. When, in his second formula, LORD ESHER says the respondent knew what he was doing and that he was doing wrong, I feel not a shadow of doubt that he had this popular paraphrase in mind. As indicated above, I feel as little doubt that his first and third formulae are regarded by him as meaning the same thing as his second. The fact that in the first and third reference is made to knowledge, not only of the nature of the act, but of its consequences, is not inconsistent with this conclusion. The more obvious consequences of an act are incorporated in the act itself. An act in the narrowest sense of the word means, as HOLMES, J., in his work on the common law, p. 54, pointed out—merely a muscular contraction, e.g., a contraction of my forefinger. But if my forefinger is on the trigger of a gun and I know the gun is pointed at X, the obvious consequence of the muscular contraction is that X will be killed or injured. The act is then the act of shooting X. In speaking of the consequences as well as the nature of the act, I do not think LORD ESHER, or the other judges who have used the same formula meant more than that, in asking whether the agent knew what he was doing, you must take unto account, in addition to the muscular contraction those of its consequences which must have been plain to the actor.

If this is right, that is to say, if the wife cannot escape liability for cruelty provided it appears that she did know what she was doing and knew that she was doing wrong, I am clearly of opinion that she has failed to make out any defence. The evidence is all the other way. To take the second point first, the evidence is overwhelming that her assaults, tirades, tantrums and insults were known by her to be wrong, for she never indulged in any of them except when alone with her husband. As to the first point, Dr. Dick's evidence is that of a man who saw her repeatedly over the material period and he is emphatic that she knew what she was doing. Not only did she behave unexceptionably before strangers, but she performed successfully a practical wage earning job as receptionist to an osteopath, and looked after the child efficiently. The commissioner rejects this evidence for reasons which, making every allowance for his opportunities of observing the witness's demeanour, seem to me inadequate. Foremost, ostensibly, among these reasons is his acceptance of Dr. Fitzgerald's evidence. One may concur with the learned commissioner's opinion that this evidence was very fairly given without concurring in his conclusion that it displaced what Dr. Dick had said. Dr. Fitzgerald had the wife under observation during two periods, at Shenley Mental Hospital from December, 1944, to January, 1945, and from December, 1947, onwards for a spell. As to the intermediate period of nearly three years, he had no direct contact with or observation of her, and his view of her condition during that period could not be more than an inference from her condition before and after it. His views, whether direct or inferential, should have been invited mainly, if not exclusively, on the question whether she knew, during this interregnum, what she was doing and whether it was wrong. But in the main the wrong questions were, in my view, put to Dr. FitzGerald. He was asked whether in his opinion the wife was " responsible " or " certifiable," questions based on the learned commissioner's view that the M'Naghten criterion was irrelevant, and that some other, wider, but quite undefined, criterion of insanity was applicable. He does not seem to have appreciated either that the Court of Appeal had, in fact, asserted the M'Naghten criterion or that a person may suffer from insanity of the will (as opposed by the intellect), and may, indeed, be certifiable without being insane within the M'Naghten rules. This robs the bulk of Dr. FitzGerald's very fair and candid evidence, for reasons for which he is not in any degree responsible, of much value in the present case. He himself at one point protested at being asked whether the wife was "responsible," and no wonder. No one tells him whether "responsible" is intended to mean morally or legally responsible, and, if the latter, in what precisely legal responsibility consists. In those circumstances it is impossible to treat his evidence as invalidating that of Dr. Dick, especially in view of replies such as the following :

> "Q.—In pursuance of that she apparently did those acts, but when she did them she would know, would she not, the sort of thing she was doing ? A.—She might have, Sir. Q.—You have seen no evidence from anybody, have you, to support the view that she did not know what she was doing at the time when she was not in your care ? A.—No, I quite agree I have no evidence. We all want to be fair to these two people. It is very difficult, I agree, but that is my answer. I have no evidence that during that period she did not know what she was doing."

For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J. : If the wife had committed a criminal offence at any time after Dec. 19, 1944, and had set up the defence of insanity, I should have thought it almost certain that the jury would have found her guilty but insane at the time. They would have rightly given great weight to the fact that she had been twice in a mental hospital and that, in view of the very experienced medical superintendent of that hospital, she was suffering from schizophrenia and was certifiable as a lunatic. His testimony would have impressed the jury just as it did the commissioner here. The views of the general practitioner would not have prevailed against it. I assume, of course, that the jury would be properly directed according to the M'Naghten rules, but even so I feel sure they would find her to have been insane at the time of doing the act. Their verdict would be given under the Trial of Lunatics Act, 1883, s. 2 (1), the words of which seem almost exactly to express the commissioner's finding in this case, namely, that she was "insane, so as not to be responsible, according to law, for [her] actions at the time when the act was done. . ." In my opinion, therefore, the commissioner's finding to that effect should not be upset. It is because I have come to this conclusion that I do not feel able to dispose of this case on the simple ground that she was not insane within the M'Naghten rules. The case, therefore, does raise to my mind the important question whether, in proceedings for divorce on the ground of cruelty, insanity is a defence or not.

In my opinion, both on principle and authority, the effect of insanity is to be regarded differently in the civil courts from what it is in the criminal courts. This is because the presence of mental disease is often hard to recognise. The light of reason may fade gradually and imperceptibly. Friends and neighbours may speculate on this or that cause, but never appreciate which is the right one until the darkness becomes obvious. Then looking back, each one of them can say, as surely as any mental specialist, that, all through the time of fading light, there was an insidious disease worming its way into the mind of the unfortunate sufferer. Each will then readily forgive conduct which before he had felt to be unforgiveable. Does this mean, however, that all that has happened in the half-light is to be wiped out as if it had never been ? During this time innocent third persons may have been injured by the sufferer. He may have made contracts and broken them, or he may have committed civil wrongs, and all done at a time when he was unknown to be a lunatic, although he has since been found to be so. If he is a man of wealth or is insured, are not the injured persons to be compensated from his estate ? If the matter were free from authority I would say they clearly are, because it is not a question of punishing him but only of compensating them. So also it seems to me that, in divorce cases, if such a man has treated his wife with cruelty, she will be entitled to maintenance, judicial separation, or a divorce, because there again it is not a question of punishing him but only of giving her relief from a situation which has been rendered intolerable by his conduct. The presence of mental disease makes this relief more, and not less, necessary. Affection may be destroyed, and the home broken, long before the disease is recognised. That is what happened both in this case and in the recent case of Cooper v. Cooper (8) where a husband, unknown at the time to be insane, attempted to strangle his wife and afterwards killed their baby. It is quite unlike a criminal case where the only question is punishment. I can well understand that a man should not be punished for acts which are outside his control by reason of mental disease, but I do not see why his wife should not be given relief from her unfortunate plight.

I venture to think that the authorities support these views. In the case of ordinary contracts it is settled law that a person of unsound mind is liable on his contract unless the other party, at the time of the making of the contract, was aware of his incapacity : see Molton v. Camroux (9), and Imperial Loan Co. v. Stone (10). In the case of torts such as trespass and assault it is also settled that a person of unsound mind is responsible for wrongful conduct committed by him before he was known by the injured person to be of unsound mind, even though it has since become apparent that such conduct was influenced by mental disease which was unrecognised at the time, and this is so even if the mental disease was such that he did not know what he was doing or that what he was doing was wrong. The reason is that the civil courts are concerned, not to punish him, but to give redress to the person he has injured. This was laid down long ago, not only by the full court in Weaver v. Ward (11), but also by such great authorities as LORD BACON, in BACON'S WORKS (Spedding ed.), vol. 7, p. 348, and SIR MATTHEW HALE (1 Hale P.C., 15). It has ever since been accepted as the law not only in this country—see per KELLY, C.B., in Mordaunt v. Mordaunt (12) (L.R. 2 P. & D. 142)—but also in the United States (Williams v. Hayes (13)) ; in Canada (Taggard v. Innes (14)) ; and in New Zealand (Donaghy v. Brennan (15)) where all the English authorities are collected. I am aware that these rules of law have been criticised by some jurists who would make responsibility in contract depend on real consent, and liability in tort depend on blameworthiness, but I venture to think that this criticism is somewhat out of date. Recent legislative and judicial developments show that the criterion of liability in tort is not so much culpability, but on whom the risk should fall. Notable examples occur in the liability of a master for, or to, his servant, and in the escape of dangerous things. I can understand, of course, that where a specific intent is a necessary ingredient of the wrong, a man may not be responsible if he was suffering at the time from a disease which made him incapable of forming that intent, e.g., Public Prosecutions Director v. Beard (16). But the cases which I have cited show that assault and trespass, to which I would add negligence, do not fall within that exception.

Turning now to divorce cases it will be seen that the same principles have been applied. In the case of desertion, where a specific intent is a necessary ingredient of the offence, insanity is a defence if it is of such a degree as to make the man incapable of forming that intent : Williams v. Williams (17). But in the cases of adultery and cruelty no specific intent is necessary, and although insanity has often been raised as a defence there is no case in which it has been made good.

It failed in Yarrow v. Yarrow (18), Hanbury v. Hanbury (4), Astle v. Astle (5), and Kellock v. Kellock (3). Take cruelty in particular, for it is what we have to deal with in this case. A specific intent to injure is not an essential ingredient in cruelty any more than it is in assault and battery : Squire v. Squire (1). It is sufficient if there is conduct which is aimed at the other : Westall v. Westall (19). If malignity had been an essential element, as Henn Collins, J., thought in Astle v. Astle (5), it may be, as he thought, that insanity would be a defence. But this court in Squire v. Squire (1) held that malignity was not essential. It followed the view of Sir William Scott in Kirkman v. Kirkman (20), where he said (1 Hag. Con. 410) that in cruelty cases :

> "If . . . safety is endangered by violent and disorderly affections of the mind, it is the same, in its effects, as if it proceeded from mere malignity alone."

Now Sir William Scott, afterwards Lord Stowell, was the greatest judge in these matters that this country has ever produced, and on the strength of his authority I say that a violent and disorderly affection of the mind, i.e., insanity, is of itself no answer to a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

I have not dealt with the difficult question what would be the position if, at the time of the violence, the injured party knew that the other was of unsound mind. I can well understand that a point might be reached when the conduct was so irrational that it was obvious to the injured party that the conduct was not cruelty, but was due to mental disease. Subject to that qualification, which does not arise in this case, I am of opinion that insanity is not a defence to a charge of cruelty. I appreciate that Asquith, L.J., is inclined to think that insanity is a defence if it is of such a degree as to satisfy the M'Naghten rules, but that is an unscientific test which is not applied even in criminal cases by the Home Office doctors who often have the final word on the matter. I am myself averse from introducing the tests of the criminal law into the civil code, and divorce, after all, is a civil matter : Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe (12) ; Tilley v. Tilley (21).

If insanity is to be of itself a defence to a charge of cruelty, I should have thought that the respondent should be excused for all conduct committed under an impulse which he was, by mental disease, in substance deprived of any power to resist. It may be remembered that Lord Atkin's committee in 1923 in its Report on Insanity and Crime (Cmd. 2005) thought that a man should be excused for his crimes on that ground. That, indeed, was the argument of counsel for the wife, and it is only because I think that insanity is not of itself a defence that I think his argument should be rejected. It is, in my opinion, not a defence unless, at any rate, the husband knew that the conduct was due to mental disease. That was clearly not the case here, and for this reason I think the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

OLIVER v. DAVIS AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), July 11, 12, 1949.]

Bill of Exchange—Consideration—Cheque given to pay antecedent debt of third party—No forbearance or promise to forbear by creditor—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (c. 61), s. 27 (1) (a), (b).

By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 27 (1) : "Valuable consideration for a bill may be constituted by (a) Any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract ; (b) An antecedent debt or liability. Such a debt or liability is deemed valuable consideration whether the bill is payable on demand or at a future time."

On July 18, 1947, the plaintiff lent £350 to W.D. and received from him a cheque for £400 post-dated to Aug. 8, but it was not presented by Aug. 19. On that date W.D., who was unable to meet his cheque, persuaded M.W. to draw a cheque for £400 in favour of the plaintiff, and an envelope containing M.W.'s cheque without any covering letter was left at the plaintiff's house. The plaintiff was away at the time and did not return home until Aug. 22, when he received M.W.'s cheque but did not know why she had sent it. In the meanwhile M.W. had discovered certain facts about W.D., and she informed the plaintiff, within an hour or two of his receiving her cheque, why she had sent it and also that she had stopped payment of it. On Aug. 23 the plaintiff presented W.D.'s cheque, which was dishonoured. Later he presented M.W.'s cheque, but it was returned by the bank marked : "Stopped by order of drawer." In an action by the plaintiff against M.W. suing her on her cheque, the plaintiff relied inter alia on s. 27 (1) (b) of the Act of 1882, but M.W. contended that there was no consideration for the cheque.

HELD : (i) "an antecedent debt or liability" within the meaning of s. 27 (1) (b) of the Act of 1882 was a debt or liability due from the maker or negotiator of the instrument and not from a third party, and, therefore, the plaintiff could not rely on s. 27 (1) (b), but had to show consideration sufficient to support a simple contract under s. 27 (1) (a).

(ii) although M.W. drew her cheque with the intention that it should be substituted for W.D.'s cheque, her motives were not communicated at the material time to the plaintiff, and he gave her no promise, express or implied, to forbear in respect of any remedy he might have against W.D., nor, as a result of her cheque, had he changed his position in any way to his detriment in regard to his claim on W.D.'s cheque, and, therefore, there was no evidence of any consideration which would entitle the plaintiff to succeed under s. 27 (1) (a), and he could not recover.

Appeal by the second defendant from a judgment of Finnemore, J., dated Mar. 7, 1949.

The plaintiff received from the first defendant a post-dated cheque for £400 in consideration for a loan of £350. After the cheque was payable, but before it was presented, the first defendant, being unable to meet it, persuaded the second defendant to draw a cheque for £400 in favour of the plaintiff and this second cheque was left at the plaintiff's house without any explanation. Shortly after the plaintiff had received the second cheque, the second defendant informed him why it was drawn and that she had stopped payment of it. The plaintiff then presented the first defendant's cheque which was dishonoured, and, later he presented the second defendant's cheque, but it was returned to him by the bank, marked " Stopped by order of drawer." The plaintiff brought an action against both defendants suing them alternatively on their cheques. The first defendant did not appear, and no further proceedings in the action were taken by the plaintiff against him. In his claim against the second defendant, the plaintiff relied inter alia on the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 27 (1) (b), on the ground that the consideration for her cheque was the antecedent debt or liability of the first defendant. Finnemore, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff against the second defendant, but the Court of Appeal now reversed his judgment on the ground that an antecedent debt or liability of a third person was not in itself sufficient to constitute valuable consideration for a bill, and, as there had been no forbearance or promise to forbear on the part of the plaintiff, and as he had not changed his position on account of the second defendant's cheque, there had been no consideration for the cheque within the meaning of either para. (a) or para. (b) of s. 27 (1). The facts appear in the judgment of Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R.

A. L. Stevenson for the second defendant.

Beney, K.C., and Neil Lawson for the plaintiff.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This is an appeal from an order of Finnemore, J., whereby the second defendant in the action, Miss Marjorie Woodcock, was ordered to pay to the plaintiff, Mr. Oliver, the sum of £400, the amount of a cheque on which the plaintiff has sued. The story of the case, the scene of which is at Egham, revolves round the first defendant, William R. Davis, who appears to have been a somewhat unsatisfactory character. In 1947 he had gone to Egham and there he became engaged to be married to the second defendant's sister, a thing which he should not have done seeing that he was already married to a wife in Gloucester. On the pretence that he was buying a house as the matrimonial home for himself and Miss Woodcock, he proceeded to enter into a contract to buy a house and furniture for £2,000. He paid £200 by way of deposit and he then extracted from his fiancee some £650, which represented her total savings, on the further pretence that it was going towards the payment of the purchase price. I gather that, in fact, the money went into his own pocket. He carried his deception a stage further by writing in the presence of both sisters a cheque for the sum of £1,847 to the solicitors of the vendors with a covering letter. That cheque and letter also went into, and remained in, his pocket. Being still in further need of finance, on July 18, 1947, he approached the plaintiff and borrowed from him the sum of £350, giving the plaintiff in return a cheque post-dated to Aug. 8, some three weeks thereafter, for £400, the £50 addition representing, no doubt, consideration for the advance. On Aug. 19 the plaintiff had not, in fact, presented Davis's cheque. Davis then represented to the second defendant that, unless he paid £400 to the plaintiff, the plaintiff would get the furniture in the house. Such was the trust imposed in this man by both sisters that the second defendant thereupon wrote her own cheque for £400 (i.e., the £350 lent, plus the £50 bonus) in favour of the plaintiff, and that cheque was taken by hand by Davis and his fiancee to the plaintiff's house on or about Aug. 19. When they arrived there, they found that the plaintiff was away. He did not return until Aug. 22. By that time the true character of Davis had been discovered by the second defendant and on Aug. 22, she stopped payment of her cheque. On the same day she saw the plaintiff, told him that she had stopped the cheque and gave him her reason for doing so. On Aug. 23 the plaintiff presented Davis's cheque which was dishonoured.

The second defendant plainly acted with the utmost lack of the most elementary prudence. The plaintiff, on his part, appears to have observed a no less remarkable reticence. The end of the transaction was that the plaintiff was in possession both of Davis's cheque and the second defendant's cheque. It was not, apparently, suggested to him—certainly he never suggested it himself—that either cheque should, at any stage, be returned by him to the second defendant. He sued both Davis and Miss Woodcock, and in the writ as originally served he sued them both cumulatively on their cheques. That form of action he amended by suing alternatively, and he gave by way of particulars of claim against the second defendant that the consideration for her cheque was his promise to relieve Davis, the first defendant, from liability in respect of his cheque. Since he had joined Davis as a party to the action and was suing him, it is not surprising that those particulars were abandoned. Against the second defendant the plaintiff relies on the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, ss. 30 and 55, and, in the alternative, in effect, on s. 27 (1) (b) of that Act, on the ground that the consideration for the cheque was the antecedent debt or liability of the first defendant, Davis. Two answers to the claim have been put forward, the first being that, on its proper construction and in the light of the facts of this case, the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 27 (1), does not operate to supply the necessary consideration to support the action on the cheque. The second answer is that the giving of the cheque was induced by a mistake of fact or by the fraud of Davis, or both, and that on that ground the second defendant can escape liability. Both grounds were rejected by the learned judge in the court below. So far as the second ground is concerned (and we have not heard counsel for the plaintiff on it), I confine myself to saying that I see no ground for differing from the view taken by the learned judge that the defence of mistake or fraud will not avail the defendant in this case. The real point in the appeal, which has not been free from difficulty, has been in regard to the first question—the validity of the defence based on want of consideration.

The facts of the case are remarkable, and I draw attention to these features in the narrative which I have given. First, at the time when the cheque was taken to the house of the plaintiff, the plaintiff was himself absent. The plaintiff's wife was there and appears to have received the envelope containing the cheque, but, according to the evidence, no statement or explanation was given to her why the cheque was brought, or, indeed, so far as I know, that the envelope contained a cheque. The plaintiff, therefore, was unaware of the benevolence of the second defendant until he returned to Egham on Aug. 22. The chronology is not entirely clear, but I assume in his favour that he returned to Egham, opened the envelope, and saw the cheque some little time, a matter of an hour or two, before he saw the second defendant and learned from her why she had sent the cheque and, at the same time, of the fact that since she had discovered the truth about Davis she had changed her mind and had stopped, or was about to stop, the cheque. So far as the plaintiff's evidence is concerned, it is, I think, important to take note of the answers he gave both in examination in chief and in cross-examination. It is plain that, at the time of the delivery of the cheque to his wife nothing was communicated to him about the second defendant's intention. At the very end of the plaintiff's examination, FINNEMORE, J., asked him :

> " Q.—Was nothing ever said about this cheque ? You found it in the envelope. Was that all you knew about it ?
> A.—Nothing at all. The point was I was not in Egham until that was drawn—until after it was stopped."

I think that that answer may not be quite accurate in fact because, as I have said, I think that he may have returned to Egham before the cheque was stopped, or, at any rate, that he learned of the cheque's existence before he learned that it had been stopped. Then his counsel asked him :

> " Q.—Was the only discussion you had with Miss Woodcock about the cheque when you went to see her on Aug. 22 ?
> A.—Correct."

In cross-examination by counsel for the second defendant, he was asked :

> " Q.—You have told my Lord that you had no communication with [the second defendant] about her cheque before she actually gave the cheque to you.
> A.—To my wife. That is correct.
> Q.—So there was no promise by you at all at that time ?
>
> A.—What about ?
> Q.—To [the second defendant] when she gave you her cheque, that you should refrain from taking proceedings against Davis.
> A.—Definitely not."

There was no re-examination. The learned judge has found, and there is no reason whatever to quarrel with his finding in any respect, that, at the time the second defendant drew the cheque she intended that it should serve the purpose of protecting Davis from being sued by the plaintiff, and, perhaps, worse. I need not refer to the whole of the relevant passage of the judgment, but the conclusion was stated thus :

> " So she [the second defendant] drew the cheque for £400 and gave it to Davis intending that Davis should take it to the plaintiff and intending that the plaintiff should pass it through his bank and collect the money."

That, no doubt, was the second defendant's intention at the time when the cheque was drawn, i.e., on Aug. 18 or 19, but it is quite clear that that intention was not then communicated to the plaintiff, and, when the plaintiff first heard what the second defendant had done and what her intention had been, he heard at the same time that for very good reasons she had changed her mind and that the cheque was stopped. Before I turn to the section and deal with the cases which have been cited I should complete the narrative to this extent. Though both Davis and the second defendant were parties to the action, Davis did not appear, and no further proceedings in the action have been taken by the plaintiff against him. The evidence of the plaintiff was that on the advice of his solicitor at a much later stage he presented the second defendant's cheque, which was returned marked by the bank : " Stopped by order of drawer."

The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 27 (1), on which the whole argument turns, is in these terms :

> " Valuable consideration for a bill may be constituted by (a) Any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract ; (b) An antecedent debt > or liability. Such a debt or liability is deemed valuable consideration whether the bill is payable on demand or at a future time."

It is pointed out by counsel for the plaintiff that para. (b), referring to an antecedent debt or liability, is on the face of it distinct in subject-matter from para. (a), which refers to consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. I think, for myself, that the proper construction of the words in para. (b), "an antecedent debt or liability," is that they refer to an antecedent debt or liability of the promisor or drawer of the bill and are intended to get over what would otherwise have been prima facie the result at common law by which the giving of a cheque for an amount for which the drawer was already indebted imported no consideration since the obligation was past. On the facts of this case it may not be strictly necessary to express a concluded view on that matter, but Crears v. Hunter (1), a decision of this court (on the law prior to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, but generally codified by that Act), in my judgment, strongly supports the view that "an antecedent debt or liability" in the sub-section ought so to be construed. If that view is right, the case falls under para. (a) rather than under para. (b) of the sub-section. It is, at any rate, plain that, if the antecedent debt or liability of a third party is to be relied on as supplying "valuable consideration for a bill," there must at least be some relationship between the receipt of the bill and the antecedent debt or liability. For practical purposes it is difficult to see how there can be any distinction between a case in which there is a sufficient relationship for this purpose between the bill and the antecedent debt or liability and a case in which, as a result of that relationship, there is in the ordinary sense a consideration passing from the payee to the drawer of the bill. Otherwise the creditor might recover both on the debt from the third party and on the cheque from the drawer.

Reference has also been made to the second part of s. 27 (1) (b):

> "Such a debt or liability is deemed valuable consideration whether the bill is payable on demand or at a future time."

There seems little doubt that that part of the paragraph was inserted to meet a point left in some doubt as the result of Currie v. Misa (2) in which, with the dissent of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., and without the assent of QUAIN, J., the view had been expressed that there was no difference in principle, where a debtor gave a bill or cheque to the creditor, between the case where the bill or cheque was post-dated and when it was payable on demand. In Currie v. Misa (2) the giver of the bill or cheque was himself the debtor. I do not think that that case can be relied on (as was suggested in argument) as casting any doubt on the authority of other decisions, particularly Crears v. Hunter (1) (which, as I have said, is a decision of this court) to the effect that, where the debt or liability is that of a third party, one must find something in the transaction sufficient at the very least to connect the receipt of the bill with the antecedent debt or liability, and, as I think, to provide, within the meaning of para. (a) of the sub-section, some consideration for the cheque in the form of forbearance or a promise to forbear, express or implied, on the part of the recipient of the cheque in regard to the third party's antecedent debt or liability.

As I have mentioned Crears v. Hunter (1) I would like to refer to one or two passages in the judgment to which SOMERVELL, L.J., referred during the argument. In that case the antecedent debt or liability was that of a third party, namely, the father of the defendant. The defendant's father had borrowed a certain sum of money from the plaintiff, and to induce the plaintiff to give time to the defendant's father for payment of the debt the defendant signed a promissory note whereby the defendant's father and the defendant jointly and severally promised to pay to the plaintiff instalments of the debt with interest half-yearly at the rate of five per cent. per annum until the amount was paid. In the course of his judgment Lord Esher, M.R., used this language after referring to certain passages in Oldershaw v. King (3) (19 Q.B.D. 345) :

> " It clearly follows . . . that, if at the request of the guarantor the creditor does in fact forbear, there is a sufficient consideration to bind the guarantor, who has promised to pay the debt. It was argued that the request to forbear must be express. But it seems to me that the question whether the request is express or is to be inferred from the circumstances is a mere question of evidence. If a request is to be implied from the circumstances, it is the same as if there were an express request." A

Lindley, L.J., dealing with the facts of the particular case, said (ibid., 346) :

> " But, except on the theory that such [viz., that the plaintiff would give the father time] was the understanding between the parties, the defendant's conduct is inexplicable. I cannot think that there was no evidence for the jury that there was forbearance by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant." B

Finally, Lopes, L.J., said (ibid.) :

> " The law appears to be that a promise to forbear is a good consideration, but also that actual forbearance at the request, express or implied, of the defendant would be a good consideration. Taking the latter of these two alternatives, it is undisputed that there was actual forbearance from suing in this case. That by itself would not be sufficient ; such forbearance must have been at the request, express or implied, of the defendant." C

There is no doubt that in some cases, particularly where the bill or cheque given has been post-dated, the court has, in the absence of express evidence, readily implied a promise, at any rate during the interval before the post-dated bill or cheque becomes payable, not to press the claim against the debtor. A number of cases to that effect were cited in argument by counsel for the plaintiff starting from Poplewell v. Wilson (4) and ending with a recent decision of Hallett, J., in Ayres v. Moore (5), but I think it plainly emerges that in each of those cases the plaintiff had forborne, or promised either expressly or impliedly to forbear, from pursuing his claim against the debtor as a consequence of, and, therefore, as consideration for, the giving of the bill which was sued on, and that the decision in each of those cases depended on that fact. Particular reliance was placed on the judgment of Parke, B., in Baker v. Walker (6), but I think his judgment, when examined, is strictly in line with the general conclusion which I have stated. Parke, B., said (14 M. & W. 468) : D E F

> " Where a man who has a judgment debt takes from his debtor a promissory note for the amount, payable at a certain time, it must be inferred that he thereby enters into an agreement to suspend his remedy for that period, and if so, that is a good consideration for the giving of the note."

Returning to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 27 (1) does not, as I read it, say that, where there is an antecedent debt or liability even on the part of the giver of the cheque, that is, without more, in every case and necessarily valuable consideration for the bill. Certainly in the case with which we are dealing, where the antecedent debt or liability is that of a third party, the matter is, I think—and I adopt the language of Lord Esher, M.R., (19 Q.B.D. 345) in Crears v. Hunter (1)—a " question of evidence." What is the evidence in this case ? I have already referred to passages from the testimony given by the plaintiff and I can draw from those passages no other conclusion than that he neither forbore, nor promised to forbear, nor ever intended or thought of forbearing for an instant, in respect of any remedy he had against Davis and any steps he might think of taking against him. If there were no oral evidence and if the plaintiff had retained the cheque for some time, albeit knowing that it had been stopped, and during that time, though Davis's cheque had fallen G H due for payment, had taken no step, the court might have inferred that he had altered his position on the faith of the second defendant's cheque, but the facts which I have stated cannot support such an inference. On the evidence given by the plaintiff it is impossible to imply any promise to forbear, just as it is clear that no express promise was given, or, I think, ever would have been given.

One passage in the second defendant's evidence was relied on, in which she was asked, under cross-examination, what steps she had taken after the stopping of the cheque :

> " Q.—You did see [the plaintiff] from time to time after the cheque had been stopped ?
> A.—Yes.
> Q.—And you did tell him, or ask him, to hold his hand, not to do anything about it for the time being ?
> A.—Yes, because my sister's money was gone too."

That, I agree, is consistent with the view that the second defendant at that time may have thought or feared that the plaintiff might sue on her cheque or Davis's cheque, or both. She was asking the plaintiff to do nothing, but I confess that I find the whole of this part of the second defendant's evidence far from clear. I have said that she acted with a remarkable lack of prudence. I think it is also clear that she had no very great understanding of what her position was. She had stopped the cheque, I gather, on advice, and in this passage, and, indeed, in the passages which preceded it, she displayed a considerable confusion of mind as to the whole matter. I do not altogether wonder. She had been grossly deceived, as her sister has been, and it is not surprising that she was by this time in a somewhat confused condition in her mind about the whole thing. But I cannot find in that passage sufficient evidence to support the view that she had ever said anything to the plaintiff to justify him in thinking that this cheque remained in any sense security for Davis's debt, or anything which qualifies the effect of the denial on the plaintiff's part of any promise by him, and, as I think, any intention by him, at any stage, to forbear against Davis. Indeed, at the beginning of his argument, counsel for the plaintiff, in answer to a question from me, conceded that there was on this evidence no ground for saying that any promise of forbearance, express or implied, as a consequence of the cheque could be imputed to the plaintiff. Later in the argument counsel for the plaintiff asked the court to draw the inference that the cheque was accepted and held by way of conditional discharge of Davis's debt. I doubt whether the latter contention is consistent with the earlier concession, but I am quite clear that the contention is quite inconsistent with the plaintiff's subsequent conduct. I, therefore, conclude on the whole facts in this case that there is no ground for saying that any consideration for the giving of this cheque is " constituted," to use the words of the section, by the " antecedent debt or liability " of Davis, or otherwise, and in this respect I reach a conclusion differing from that of the learned judge in the court below.

The greater part of the learned judge's judgment was directed to the question which we have not found it necessary to deal with (except very briefly) of mistake or fraud as a defence to the action, but after the passage in the judgment to which I have already made reference, and after referring to s. 27 (1) of the Act of 1882, the learned judge said :

> " Sub-section (b), of course, differs from the ordinary law of contract and is a special provision dealing with incidents of this kind. There was an antecedent debt or liability because Davis owed the plaintiff the sum of £400 on a cheque. He had actually received £350 in hard cash a month or so earlier. [The second defendant] knew it. She says so, and it was because of that and knowing the existence of that liability that she paid this cheque > to [the plaintiff]. It is true that she was actuated by other motives—very natural ones—she wanted to ensure that her sister did not lose the furniture and the bungalow. There was a liability, without any question at all, and, equally without any question, [the second defendant] drew this cheque in favour of the plaintiff because of the antecedent debt or liability of Davis, who was then, apparently, about to be married to her sister. Davis's cheque being out of the way and there being a properly-drawn cheque, there is on the evidence before me plain consideration in the existence of this antecedent debt or liability."

With all respect, I cannot agree that that is an exhaustive statement of the case. An antecedent debt or liability of a third party in vacuo cannot form a valuable consideration. Some connection at the least must be shown between the receipt of the bill and the debt, and, even though the motives of the second defendant were as the learned judge stated, there is no doubt that they were not communicated at the material time to the plaintiff. In my judgment, there is nothing in this case which can provide a consideration for the cheque by reference to the antecedent debt or liability of Davis, and nothing which would allow the court to infer any forbearance, any change of attitude to his detriment, on the part of the plaintiff, as a result of this cheque, in regard to Davis and his claim on Davis's cheque.

For these reasons, with all respect to the learned judge, I think that the plaintiff ought not to have obtained judgment against the second defendant on the cheque. I confess I am not sorry to reach that conclusion, for it seems to me that the contrary result would in the circumstances of this case have offended against common sense. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : In suing on this cheque the plaintiff in his amended statement of claim anticipated a possible defence that there was no consideration for it by pleading in para. 3 :

> "Further or alternatively the consideration for the said cheque was the antecedent debt or liability of the first-named defendant to the plaintiff."

That is the first issue which we have to decide.

The question of the effect of an antecedent debt is dealt with in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 27 (1). It is important, I think, to read the two paragraphs of the sub-section together :

> "Valuable consideration for a bill may be constituted by (a) Any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract ; (b) An antecedent debt or liability. Such a debt or liability is deemed valuable consideration whether the bill is payable on demand or at a future time."

In approaching matters which are at present covered by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, one must bear in mind what was laid down by Lord Herschell in respect of this Act in Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers (7), and what has been laid down by other judges in respect of Acts which are by their title codifying Acts. I do not propose to read what Lord Herschell said, but I think this is an accurate summary of it. He said that one must first examine the Act, and one must not start by looking at the old cases. One must first construe the Act, and it is only in certain circumstances that one is entitled to refer to earlier decisions. He gives one example ([1891] A.C. 145) :

> "If . . . a provision be of doubtful import, such resort would be perfectly legitimate."

It seems to me that the first question which arises in this case is : Is the antecedent debt or liability referred to in s. 27 (1) (b) only an antecedent debt due from the person who gave the negotiable instrument in respect of which no consideration was given ? I am prepared to assume on consideration that, reading

s. 27 (1) (a) and (b) together, the natural construction of "antecedent debt" is that it means a debt due from the person who gives the negotiable instrument in question. Assuming, however, that the words are of doubtful import, there is the decision of this court in Crears v. Hunter (1), which, though subsequent in date to the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, must have been decided on the law prior to the codification in that Act because the instrument in question was given in 1877 before the Act came into force. I presume that the law to be applied would be the law at the time the instrument was given. In the argument in the case no reference is made to s. 27, and the learned judges do not seem to be purporting to construe it. Assuming, however, in favour of counsel for the plaintiff, that the words of the Act are of doubtful import, this is a case which we can apply. On that basis it seems to me to resolve that doubtful import in the sense in which I have indicated, namely, that the antecedent debt or liability in s. 27 (1) (b) is a debt or liability due from the maker or negotiator of the instrument and not from a third party. That being so, in this case the plaintiff cannot rely on s. 27 (1) (b). He cannot say: "Because there was an antecedent debt or liability from the third party, therefore I am entitled to succeed." Crears v. Hunter (1) makes it perfectly clear that, when dealing with a negotiable instrument given in respect of a debt of a third party, consideration has to be found such as is now referred to in s. 27 (1) (a), namely, consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. If that is right, the plaintiff has here to show a consideration sufficient to support a simple contract. I do not propose to go into the facts which have been already stated by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS, but, for the reasons which he has given, I think that the plaintiff fails to establish any consideration such as would support a simple contract. In my judgment, on the facts there is no evidence that he forbore, nor is there evidence of any other consideration which would entitle him to succeed under s. 27 (1) (a). For these reasons I think that this appeal succeeds.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. At one time under the count for indebitatus assumpsit the common law used habitually to enforce promises for which the only consideration was an antecedent debt or liability of the promisor to the promisee: see SMITH'S LEADING CASES, 13th ed., vol. I, pp. 153, 154, and 635, 636. It still does enforce them to some extent as, for instance, in the case of a promise contained in a cheque given for an antecedent debt or liability of the promisor. Section 27 (1) (b) of the Act of 1882 gives statutory effect to this rule, but it does not apply to a promise to pay an antecedent debt or liability of a third person. In such a case, in order that the promise may be enforced, there must be shown a consideration which is sufficient to support a simple contract. This is the view expressed in BYLES ON BILLS, 20th ed., p. 133, and it is also adopted in Crofts v. Beale (8) and Crears v. Hunter (1). If the judgment of HALLETT, J. ([1939] 4 All E.R. 353) in Ayres v. Moore (5) contains anything to the contrary, I cannot agree with it. As to what is sufficient consideration, an express or implied agreement by the creditor to forbear from suing the third person is, of course, good consideration. So, also, is the simple fact of forbearance by the creditor, even if it only arises ex post facto, providing that the promise to pay was given with the intention of gaining forbearance: see per PARKER, J. ([1909] 1 Ch. 298, 303) in Wigan v. English & Scottish Law Life Assurance Assocn. (9). The enforcement of the promise to pay, where there is no promise to forbear, express or implied, but only the fact of forbearance, is really the enforcement of a simple unilateral contract. There must be consideration before it will be enforced, but the consideration need not arise at the time of the contract. It is sufficient if it arises ex post facto. The real reason why the promise to pay is enforced is because it was intended to be binding, intended to be acted on, and was, in fact, acted on. Then once the promise has been acted on, the act done is itself sufficient consideration for the promise. The old common law had no difficulty in enforcing simple unilateral contracts, but it always required that there should be consideration, i.e., some act done or forbearance shown by the promisee on the faith of the promise, or, as it was sometimes put, something done to his detriment, before he could come to the court to enforce it. In my opinion, that is the law to-day. In the present case, as counsel for the plaintiff admitted, the plaintiff in no way changed his position in consequence of the promise. There is, therefore, no consideration for it. He cannot, therefore, recover. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON STADIUMS, LTD.

[King's Bench Division (Lord Goddard, C.J.), July 11, 1949.]

Company — Stamp duty — Exemption — Capital duty — Transfer duty — Amalgamation of companies—Transfer of undertaking in return for shares in transferee company—Sale by "existing" company of part of shareholding within two years of amalgamation—Finance Act, 1927 (c. 10), s. 55 (6) (b).

By the Finance Act, 1927, s. 55, where a company (called "the transferee company") has increased its capital with a view to the acquisition of the undertaking of an existing company, the transferee company is entitled to exemption from stamp duty on the increase and on the instrument of transfer of the undertaking, but it is provided by sub-s. (6) that if "(b) . . . the existing company within a period of two years from the date . . . of the authority for the increase of the capital of the transferee company ceases, otherwise than in consequence of reconstruction, amalgamation or liquidation, to be the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it . . . the exemption shall be deemed not to have been allowed, and an amount equal to the duty remitted shall become payable forthwith, and shall be recoverable from the transferee company . . ."

L.S., Ltd., increased its capital from £100 to £750,000 with a view to acquiring the undertaking of three existing companies, and it acquired those undertakings in consideration of its own shares which it issued to the existing companies. It applied for and obtained exemption from capital duty on the increase and of transfer stamp duty on the conveyance of the undertakings to it. Within six months the existing companies sold a large portion of the shares so issued to them to a firm of stockbrokers with a view to their being offered for sale to the public, and the Revenue claimed from L.S., Ltd., payment of the capital duty and transfer duty remitted, together with interest.

Held: by ceasing to be beneficial owners of a portion of the shares issued to them, the existing companies ceased to be beneficial owners of "the shares" within the meaning of s. 55 (6) (b), and, therefore, L.S., Ltd., lost the exemption from duty which had been granted to it.

ACTION by the Crown under the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, to recover an amount equal to capital duty and transfer duty remitted in connection with an amalgamation of companies. These proceedings were concerned with the preliminary point whether certain transactions had the effect of depriving the defendant company of the exemption previously granted. LORD GODDARD, C.J., found in favour of the Crown, and the case was remitted for trial of the question of the amount for which the defendant company was liable.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Attorney-General.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : I mean no disrespect to the interesting and elaborate argument of counsel for the company if I do not call on counsel for the Crown, because this case raises a short point of construction of a section in an Act of Parliament and I have come to a clear conclusion as to the way in which I ought to construe it. I came to that conclusion even before I saw the judgment of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., in Lever Bros., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), and it is a satisfaction to me to find that his opinion, although I think there is good ground for saying that the conclusion which he expressed was obiter, was the same as that which I had formed, and it, therefore, supports my view.

By the Finance Act, 1927, s. 55, Parliament gave certain relief to companies which were reconstructing themselves or amalgamating with other companies. It is unnecessary to go through the elaborate provisions of this rather complicated section, because a full exposition was given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in the case to which I have referred. Suffice it to say that, where a company has amalgamated with another company or companies and certain conditions are fulfilled, relief is given by that section from capital and transfer stamp duty. A necessary element in the amalgamation of companies is that the undertaking or the shares of one company are transferred to the company with which it is being amalgamated, and in the ordinary way, and but for this section, stamp duty would have to be paid on the transfer of the undertaking or the shares in the same way as, if I buy on the Stock Exchange shares which are transferred to me, ad valorem stamp duty has to be paid. So, if, for instance, a small company was amalgamating with a big company and the terms of amalgamation provided for the acquisition of ninety per cent. of the smaller company's shares, the shares would have to be transferred to the company which is in the Act called the " transferee company " and ad valorem duty would have to be paid were it not for this section. Section 55 (6) provides, however :

> " If . . . (b) where shares in the transferee company have been issued to the existing company in consideration of the acquisition, the existing company within a period of two years from the date, as the case may be, of the registration or incorporation, or of the authority for the increase of the capital, of the transferee company ceases, otherwise than in consequence of reconstruction, amalgamation or liquidation, to be the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it " the transferee company shall repay to the Crown with interest the amount of stamp duty which they have been excused.

On June 5, 1946, an agreement was entered into whereby the defendant company, London Stadiums, Ltd., agreed to acquire the Wandsworth Stadium, the Park Royal Stadium and the Charlton Stadium in return for shares in London Stadiums, Ltd. The London Stadiums Co. enlarged its capital from £100 to £750,000, so that it could issue enough shares to pay for the undertakings that it was acquiring, and " the existing companies " (which is the expression that the Act uses to describe the Wandsworth, Park Royal and Charlton companies) then became shareholders in the London Stadiums Co. The London Stadiums Co. transferred to Wandsworth 2,740,000, to Park Royal 2,250,000, and to Charlton 2,500,000 two-shilling shares which, on Nov. 4, 1946, were sub-divided into one-shilling shares. On Nov. 5, 1946, the existing companies sold a substantial portion of the shares which had so been transferred to them to a firm of stockbrokers with a view to a market being created and the public coming in as shareholders. The Wandsworth company sold 750,000, the Park Royal company sold 500,000, and Charlton sold 750,000 one-shilling shares in London Stadiums, Ltd. A

The only question that I have to determine is what is the true construction of the words " ceases to be a beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it." Counsel for the company has contended that I should insert the word " all," so that it reads " the beneficial owner of all the shares so issued," and he says that, as the existing companies did not sell all the shares which they had acquired, the section does not catch the transferee company, and it still remains exempt B from stamp duty and does not have to account for it to the Crown. On the other hand, he says that for the Crown to succeed, I have to read these words as " the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it or any of them." My view is that I do not have to add any words at all. I have simply to see what is the true construction of the words, " the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it." It seems to me that, if one looks at the object of the section, which deals C with what I may call a genuine amalgamation of companies, it contemplates that, if the transferee company is to get the substantial benefit that is given in the shape of relief from stamp duty, the existing companies must keep those shares and not market them to the public or elsewhere for a period of at least two years. The section was not meant to facilitate the creation of a market in shares. It was meant to facilitate the genuine amalgamation of businesses D which were to remain amalgamated for at least two years. However that may be, and giving the full effect to the rule of construction which counsel for the company has emphasised—that, if there is an ambiguity in a section, it must be resolved in favour of the taxpayer—and assuming that, as this is an exception to an exception, that rule would apply, I fail to find any ambiguity here at all. I think it is impossible to say that, where a person parts with E some of the shares that have been issued to him, he remains the beneficial owner of the shares so issued. He does not. The shares so issued, we will say, are x. If he has sold the shares, he is not the beneficial owner of x. He is the beneficial owner of x minus y. It seems to me, therefore, that on the clear words of the statute, the Crown are right in this case, and, I accordingly, give judgment for them with costs. F

Order accordingly.

R. v. WAY AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Streatfeild and Devlin, JJ.), June, 20, 21, July 11, 1949.)

Criminal Law—Betting—Use of office for betting—"Persons resorting thereto"—Automatic "clocks" for timing of bets—Betting slips taken by "runners" and timed by "clock" outside office—"Clocks" later taken to office by "runners"—Money and betting slips in "clocks"—Betting Act, 1853 (c. 119), ss. 1, 3.

Betting "clocks" were issued by a company to persons known as "runners" who collected betting slips outside the office of the company and placed them in the "clocks" so that the exact time at which each bet was received might be automatically recorded. Later, the "clocks," which contained betting slips, and in some cases money, were handed in by the "runners" at the company's office and received by officials of the company. It being contended by the prosecution that the "runners" resorted to the office either to make bets for the "punters" or on their own behalf, contrary to the Betting Act, 1853, ss. 1, 3,

HELD: the "runners" made bets as agents of the company outside the company's office and resorted to the office to give an account of their transactions and not for the purpose of betting, and, therefore, the company was not guilty of using the office for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto and the officials of the company could not be convicted of aiding and abetting the company in the commission of that offence.

[AS TO OFFENCES UNDER THE BETTING ACT, 1853, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 510-516, paras. 917-921; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 436-439, Nos. 337-349.]

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellants, Percival John Ernest Way and Woolf Nathan Sherman, were convicted before SELLERS, J., at the Glamorgan Assizes on Mar. 14, 1949, of aiding and abetting a company in the commission of offences against the Betting Act, 1853, ss. 1, 3. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by DEVLIN, J. The appeals were allowed and the convictions quashed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 11. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment of the court. On Mar. 14, 1949, the two appellants were convicted at Cardiff Assizes of aiding and abetting a company called Harry Sherman, Ltd., in the commission of offences against the Betting Act, 1853, and were sentenced to be fined £200 and £100 respectively. Harry Sherman, Ltd., carries on a betting business in Cardiff and the two appellants are employed as office manager and clerk respectively. The company was indicted as the principal offender, but for reasons already given ([1949] 2 All E.R. 207) this court has quashed that indictment. Counsel for the appellants accepts, subject to a qualification to which I shall later refer, that, if the company is guilty of the offences charged, the appellants are likewise guilty of aiding and abetting. Accordingly, the substantial question in the appeal is whether the company committed either of the offences alleged in the two counts of the indictment. Counsel for the appellants submits that there was no evidence fit to go to the jury on either count, and, alternatively, that there was misdirection.

The first count charges that on Nov. 10, 1948, the company used an office in its premises for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. The facts material to this charge are short and not in dispute. On the morning of Nov.

10 certain persons, in this case referred to as "runners," attended at the company's offices and received an instrument known as a betting "clock." This instrument enables the "runner" to record accurately and, it is hoped, beyond the possibility of fraud, the exact time at which he receives a betting slip from a "punter." The "runner" having received slips in relation to one or more races to be run, say, at 1.30, would put the slips in bags and insert the bags in the "clock." The time of insertion would automatically be registered so that there could be no doubt whether or not the bets were taken before the result of the race could be known. During the afternoon and evening of Nov. 10 these "runners" returned to the company's office with their betting "clocks" containing the slips they had taken that day and in some cases money as well. It is, therefore, common ground that the "runners" resorted to the office and that they were the only persons who did. The "punters" did not. Accordingly, the only question is whether the "runners" resorted to the office "for the purpose of betting."

It appears to the court that the natural inference to be drawn from the facts set out above is that the "runner" was the agent of the company to make bets; that he made the bet when he accepted the slip and put it in his "clock"—acts which took place outside the company's office; and that he resorted to the office for the purpose of giving an account of his transactions and not for the purpose of betting. The prosecution puts the matter differently. They say that the "runner" resorted to the office either for the purpose of making bets as agent for the "punter" and on his behalf or for the purpose of making bets himself with the company by way of reinsurance of bets he had already made as a principal with the "punter." On the former view, the "runner" did not make a bet when he received the slip, but treated it as an offer which on behalf of the "punter" he conveyed to the company. If the company accepted the offer, it did so in its own office where the bet was, therefore, made. It is obvious, and is not disputed by the prosecution, that bets made when the "runners" returned to the office must in many cases have been made on races that had already been run and the result of which was known. Accordingly, if this view be correct, the company would frequently be able to decide in the light of the result of a race whether to accept or reject a bet made on it. If the alternative view is correct and the bets were being made by the "runner" by way of reinsurance, then the agreement between the company and the "runner" must be that, if the "runner" paid over his winnings on bets made earlier in the day, the company would reimburse him his losses on similar bets. Whether such an agreement is a bet is open to question. It was, however, for the prosecution to establish that when the "runner" arrived at the office on the afternoon of Nov. 10 and handed over his betting "clock," containing slips, and, possibly, money, he was then, either as principal or agent, making a bet with the company. We do not think that there is any material from which a jury could draw that inference. We think, therefore, with respect to SELLERS, J., who ruled otherwise, that the submission that there was no evidence on this count to go to the jury is correct and that the conviction on it must be set aside.

Appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. HEAVER, LTD.

Kɪɴɢ's Bᴇɴᴄʜ Dɪᴠɪsɪᴏɴ (Croom-Johnson, J.), May 16, 1949.]

Excess Profits Tax—Company—Computation of standard profit—Directors with controlling interest—"Working proprietor"—"Director"—Person not holding number of qualification shares prescribed by articles—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 13 (2) (b), as amended by Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 31 (1).

The Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 13 (2), as amended by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 31 (1), provides that, in computing standard profit for the purpose of excess profits tax in the case of a trade or business carried on by a company "the directors whereof have a controlling interest therein," the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have a discretion to make certain allowances. Before so doing the commissioners must be satisfied, having regard to the nature and size of the business as shown by the assets, that the minimum sum of standard profit specified by s. 13 (2) is inadequate and they may then make an allowance limited to £1,000 in respect of each "working proprietor," i.e., a full time working director who owns more than one-twentieth of the share capital of the company, or £4,000 in the aggregate. In the respondent company two individuals each of whom had been fully engaged in the company's business during the relevant period and held more than one-twentieth of the issued share capital were held by general commissioners to be directors although they did not hold the number of shares necessary for qualification as directors under the company's articles of association.

Hᴇʟᴅ : in view of the provisions of the articles of association and of the Companies Act, 1929, s. 141 (1), which imposed on directors a statutory duty to hold the share qualification specified in the articles, neither of the individuals in question was a "director" within the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 13 (2) (b) (as amended by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 31 (1)), and so not a "working proprietor" within para. (a) of s. 13 (2).

Cᴀsᴇ Sᴛᴀᴛᴇᴅ by General Commissioners of Income Tax.

The commissioners found that Mr. John T. Heaver and Mr. John Heaver ere directors of Heaver, Ltd., the respondent company, in the chargeable ccounting periods ending Apr. 30, 1943 and Apr. 30, 1944, for the purpose of an ssessment to excess profits tax on the company. As the result of that finding he special provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 13 (2), as amended y the Finance Act, 1940, s. 31 (1), with regard to the computation of standard rofits could have been put into operation. Cʀᴏᴏᴍ-Jᴏʜɴsᴏɴ, J., now reversed he decision and allowed the appeal by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : This is a Case stated by the general ommissioners for the Amesbury (Wiltshire) division on the hearing of an ppeal by a company named Heaver, Ltd., against an assessment made on hem for the accounting periods ending Apr. 30, 1943, and Apr. 30, 1944, to xcess profits tax. Excess profits tax is the creature of the Finance (No. 2)

Act, 1939, s. 12. Section 13 of that Act provided that the standard profits of a trade or business in relation to any chargeable accounting period were to be taken in certain circumstances, and, to temper the wind to the shorn lamb—the taxpayer—sub-s. (2) of that section provided some limitation. That sub-section was repealed in the following year and the material provision is now to be found in the Finance Act, 1940, s. 31 (2), a proviso of which enacts that in the case of a trade or business carried on by "a company, the directors whereof have a controlling interest therein," in making the computation of excess profits, the company are allowed to take into account a sum of money calculated in this way :

> "if . . . the commissioners, having regard to the nature of the business and the size of the business as shown by the value of the assets employed therein, are satisfied that the said greater sum is inadequate, they may, if they think fit, direct that there shall be allowed in respect of not more than four working proprietors such additional sum, not exceeding £1,000 for each individual working proprietor or £4,000 in the aggregate, as may be specified in the direction."

In the sub-section the expression "working proprietor" is given a meaning which is satisfied by the findings in the present case, and I need not say anything more about it, but this occurs in paragraph (b) of the proviso :

> "The expression 'proprietor' means, in the case of a trade or business carried on by a partnership, a partner therein, and, in the case of a company, any director thereof owning more than one-twentieth of the share capital of the company."

In the facts found relating to this particular company it is stated that two individuals, John T. Heaver and John Heaver, junior, have each held 200 shares since June 25, 1940, which means that each of them hold more than one-twentieth of the issued share capital of the company. The question which remains is : Were they directors ? The general commissioners have found, not as a fact but as a matter of law, expressly, that these two individuals are directors of the company in law and have been fully engaged in the company's business in respect of the period covered by the appeal. Under the company's articles of association it is provided in art. 16 : "The qualification of every director shall be the holding in his own right and as sole holder of shares of the company to the nominal value of not less than £500." Article 18, which is headed "Disqualification of directors," provides : "The office of a director shall be vacated . . . (d) If he cease to hold the necessary share qualification or do not obtain the same within one calendar month from the date of his appointment." It is not disputed, and has been found as a fact, that neither of the two individuals named directors for this purpose ever held 500 £1 shares nominal in the capital of this company. Is it right, then, to say that at the material time they were directors of the company ?

The argument which, apparently, found favour with the general commissioners, was this. For the purpose of this legislation the word "director" has the same meaning as in the Finance Act, 1937. On turning to the Finance Act, 1937, to find out what is the meaning of the word in that statute, the inquirer is sent on another voyage of discovery, because para. 13 (b) of sched. IV to that Act, provides : "(b) the expression 'director' has the same meaning as in s. 144 of the Companies Act, 1929." Section 144 provides for the keeping of a register of directors of a company and prescribes returns which must be made. Of course, the fact that a return is made under the section cannot turn an invalid or unauthorised appointment into a valid or authorised appointment. I have to read s. 144 with s. 380 (1) of the same Act. Counsel for the respondents points out to me that the latter section is not mentioned in the Finance Act, 1937. Section 380 (1) begins : "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them (that is to say)," and then in partial contradiction of that language they say " director " not " means " but " includes any person occupying the position of director by whatever name called." The argument is that that means that anybody who acts as a director, and, therefore, occupies the position of a director, is a director for the purposes of the Companies Act, 1929, and, therefore, for the purposes of s. 144, and, therefore, for the purposes of the Finance Act, 1937, and in the last resort for the purposes of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 13 (2), as amended by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 31 (1).

It is a highly ingenious argument appropriate to the subject under discussion. I do not think that the words " ' director ' includes any person occupying the position of director by whatever name called " mean otherwise than this. When construing the Companies Act, 1929, it does not matter what the individual is called if he is, in fact, discharging—and I think that must mean lawfully discharging in accordance with the constitution of the company—directorial functions. The Act is then to apply to him as a director. I do not think that that helps me in the present instance. The Companies Act, 1929, s. 141—and having regard to the argument of counsel for the respondents I do not know whether I am permitted even to look at it—deals with the qualification of directors or managers which is reproduced in the articles. Frequently provisions are included in articles of association which are not required to be there because the statute deals with their subject-matter. It is convenient when a question of this sort crops up to have it in the articles, as then there can be no doubt. Section 141 (1) provides :

> ". . . it shall be the duty of every director who is by the articles of the company required to hold a specified share qualification, and who is not already qualified, to obtain his qualification within two months after his appointment, or such shorter time as may be fixed by the articles."

In this case a shorter time—one month—was fixed. Sub-section (3) of s. 141 provides:

> " The office of director of a company shall be vacated if the director does not within two months from the date of his appointment, or within such shorter time as may be fixed by the articles, obtain his qualification, or if after the expiration of the said period or shorter time he ceases at any time to hold his qualification."

Sub-section (4) contains this provision :

> " A person vacating office under this section shall be incapable of being re-appointed director of the company until he has obtained his qualification."

Sub-section (5) provides for a fine not exceeding £5 for every day during which the unqualified person acts as director of the company. By s. 144 (6) :

> " For the purposes of this section a person in accordance with whose directions or instructions the directors of a company are accustomed to act shall be deemed to be a director and officer of the company."

The latter point, however, does not appear to have been raised before the general commissioners. There is no indication of it in their recital of the contentions advanced before them, and there are no facts of necessity found by the commissioners which might lead me to believe that that is what made them think that these persons are directors in law. I, therefore, put that on one side.

It is said that in view of these provisions these persons are to be regarded as directors, although, in fact, they do not hold the qualifying shares prescribed by the articles of the company and required by the Companies Act, 1929, s. 141 (1) or have omitted to alter the articles of association by reducing the figure from £500 to something less. It is said that, when a director of a company has no qualification shares or an insufficient number of qualification shares, it is, nevertheless, still possible for the company to bind itself by his acts.

While it has not been raised expressly in that form before me today, apparently the contention was relied on below that, according to the principle enunciated in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (1), a company is nevertheless bound in circumstances such as these and these two people are to be regarded as de facto directors and so satisfy the words of the section which I am asked to construe. I think that is a complete misunderstanding of what Royal British Bank v. Turquand (1) decided. I will read a short passage from the speech of Lord Simonds in the House of Lords in Morris v. Kanssen (7) ([1946] 1 All E.R. 592) ; (1946 A.C. p. 474) :

> " The so-called rule in Turquand's case (1) is, I think, correctly stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, Hailsham edn., vol. V, p. 423 : ' But persons contracting with a company and dealing in good faith may assume that the acts within its constitution and powers have been properly and duly performed, and are not bound to inquire whether acts of internal management have been regular.' "

I asked who are the persons who are said to have contracted with this company, so that I can apply the reasoning and the principle laid down in that case to the facts of the present case. I have not been told. It clearly is not the inspector of taxes ; it clearly is not the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ; it clearly is not the legislature who passed this condition of granting this particular relief. Perhaps I ought to say that in every case of this kind it is on the Crown to discharge the onus of proving the company to be liable. I do not treat this as an exception out of the general liability which the company would have to discharge. Lord Simonds goes on in the judgment from which I have quoted ([1946] 1 All E.R. p. 592 ; [1946] A.C. p. 475):

> " I asked learned counsel for the appellants whether there was any authority for the proposition that a director or de facto director could invoke the rule so as to validate a transaction which was in fact irregular and unauthorised. He could point to none. My own researches, though in such a matter they cannot easily be complete, have disclosed no case in which such a proposition has been affirmed. Nor have I met any case in which such a person has, without discussion of the principle, obtained such relief."

I will not read any more. There is some vigorous language used by Lord Simonds in the next few passages of that speech that will repay attention.

I cannot conceive how anybody could find, as a matter of law, as it seems to me in the teeth of the wording of the statute, that the individuals here concerned are directors of this company. In my view, the general commissioners have come to a wrong conclusion and the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

R. v. ST. PANCRAS BOROUGH ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE. Ex parte THE RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Singleton, L.JJ.), June 27, 28, July 8, 1949.]

Rates and Rating—Railway hereditament—Occupancy by Crown—Inclusion in supplemental list as so occupied—Resumption of occupancy of railway company—Inclusion in provisional list after passing of Local Government Act, 1948, and the coming into force of provisions exempting railway hereditaments from rating—Local Government Act, 1948 (c. 26), ss. 85, 89 (5).

The Local Government Act, 1948, s. 85 (which came into force on Apr. 1, 1948), provides : " (1) Save as is otherwise provided in this Part of this Act, no premises which are or form part of . . . (a) a railway . . . hereditament (as defined for the purposes of this Part of this Act) . . . shall be liable to be rated or be included in any valuation list or in any rate . . ."

Prior to 1941 a hereditament known as Euston House was occupied by a railway company and was entered in the valuation list for the borough of St. Pancras as a railway hereditament. In 1941 the Crown took possession of Euston House and remained in occupation until the end of June, 1947, when the property reverted to the occupancy of the railway company. At all material times since 1947 the railway company, or its successors, the Railway Executive, were in occupation of the property. During the Crown's occupancy, Euston House was not liable to be rated, and it was, therefore, entered in the supplemental valuation list for 1946 as being so occupied, but on Apr. 5, 1948, the rating authority made a provisional list in which they inserted the name of the Railway Executive as occupier and £12,004 and £10,000 as the gross and rateable values. Having regard to s. 85 of the Act of 1948, which was then in force, the Railway Executive objected to the inclusion of the hereditament in the provisional list, but the assessment committee disallowed the objection on the ground that, when read as a whole, pt. V of the Act (which comprises ss. 85-110) justified its inclusion, particularly, in view of s. 89 (5) of the Act which provides : " Save as provided in the preceding provisions of this section, and without prejudice to the provisions of the next following sub-section, no alteration shall be made in any valuation list (a) so far as it relates to any hereditament in England or Wales which is . . . to be deemed to be a railway or canal hereditament ; or (b) for the purpose of securing that any other hereditament in England or Wales is treated as or as part of a railway or canal hereditament until the provisions of Part III of this Act . . . have come into force." Euston House was not affected by " the preceding provisions of " the section. Part III of the Act had not come into force on Apr. 5, 1948.

HELD : having regard to the terms of s. 85 (1) and the general scheme of pt. V of the Act, s. 89 (5), which was restrictive and not enabling, afforded no justification for the inclusion of Euston House in the provisional list ; apart from that sub-section there was nothing in the Act to qualify the general immunity afforded to railway hereditaments by s. 85 (1) ; and, therefore, the objection of the Railway Executive should be upheld.

[AS TO RATING OF RAILWAYS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, pp. 396-417, paras. 829-847 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 38, pp. 487-491, Nos. 449-465, and pp. 534-546, Nos. 796-892.]

APPEAL by the St. Pancras Borough Assessment Committee from a judgment of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division dated Jan. 25, 1949, granting an order of certiorari to quash a decision of the assessment committee rejecting an objection by the Railway Executive to a provisional valuation list.

The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts are set out in their Lordships' judgments, and are summarised in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : Prior to 1941 the hereditament known as Euston House, Eversholt Street, in the county of London, was occupied by the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co., and was entered in the valuation list for the borough of St. Pancras as a railway hereditament in accordance with the procedure provided by the Railways (Valuation for Rating) Act, 1930. During 1941 the hereditament was taken possession of by the Crown who remained in occupation until the end of June, 1947. On the termination of the occupancy of the Crown the hereditament reverted to the occupation of the railway company and at all material times since has been in the occupation of the railway company or its successors, the Railway Executive. During the Crown's occupancy the hereditament was not liable to be rated, and it was, accordingly, entered in the supplemental valuation list for 1946 as being in the occupation of the Air Ministry and Ministry of Supply, and it was also entered in that part of the list in which are shown properties occupied for the purposes of the Crown and exempt from rating and the contributions made in lieu of rates in respect thereof. As a result of the Crown's occupation having ceased at the end of June, 1947, the rating authority, on Apr. 5, 1948, made a provisional list in which they inserted the name of the Railway Executive, London Midland Region, as the occupiers, and £12,004 and £10,000 as the gross and rateable values respectively. On Apr. 1, 1948, however, pt. V of the Local Government Act, 1948, had come into force. Section 85 in that Part of the Act provides :

> " (1) Save as is otherwise provided in this Part of this Act, no premises which are or form part of . . . (a) a railway . . . hereditament (as defined for the purposes of this Part of this Act) . . . shall be liable to be rated or be included in any valuation list or in any rate . . ."

The Railway Executive, accordingly, made objection to the provisional list, which objection was in due course disallowed by the assessment committee who confirmed the provisional list. Thereupon the Railway Executive applied to the Divisional Court for an order of certiorari directed to the assessment committee to quash their determination or order in relation to this hereditament and in relation to the provisional list purporting to include the said hereditament. Their application succeeded and the determination or order was quashed. From this decision the assessment committee appeal.

The question involved in this appeal depends on the proper construction of ss. 85 and 89 of the Local Government Act, 1948. I have already quoted the words relied on by the Railway Executive who contend that nothing is to be found in pt. V of the Act excluding this hereditament from this general exemption. On the other hand, the assessment committee submit that the sections, when read as a whole, and, particularly s. 89 (5) (b), justify the inclusion of this hereditament in the valuation list and the consequential demand for the payment of rates. Section 89 (5), so far as material, reads as follows :

> " Save as provided in the preceding provisions of this section, and without prejudice to the provisions of the next following sub-section, no alteration shall be made in any valuation list (a) so far as it relates to any hereditament in England or Wales which is by virtue of sub-s. (3) of this section to be deemed to be a railway or canal hereditament ; or (b) for the purpose of securing that any other hereditament in England or Wales is treated as or as part of a railway or canal hereditament until the provisions of pt. III of this > Act relating to the alteration of valuation lists by means of proposals made by or served on valuation officers have come into force."

It is common ground that the provisions of pt. III of the Act had not come into force on Apr. 5, 1948. It is also common ground that the hereditament in question is a "railway hereditament" as defined by s. 86. It is said by the assessment committee that on the departure of the Crown it became their duty under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, to see that correct entries were made in the valuation list, and that, if they altered the list by simply omitting this hereditament altogether, they would be infringing sub-s. (5) (b) because the only justification for its omission would be for the purpose of its being treated as or as part of a railway hereditament.

It is to be noted that on Apr. 1, 1948, when pt. V of the Local Government Act, 1948, came into operation, the valuation list in force included the supplemental list of 1946 which showed the Air Ministry and Ministry of Supply as occupiers. On Apr. 1, 1948, the hereditament was, in fact, a railway hereditament occupied by the Railway Executive. Whence do the assessment committee derive their jurisdiction to correct the list and make it accord with the facts where the hereditament is a railway hereditament and as such immune from inclusion in any valuation list by virtue of the opening words of s. 85 ? By Apr. 1, 1948, the railway valuation roll for the fourth quinquennial period under the Railways (Valuation for Rating) Act, 1930, had not been completed. The relevant provisions of that Act were repealed on Apr. 1, 1948. Parts of the roll had, however, been completed in certain areas and the necessary alterations consequential thereon had been made in some valuation lists. To deal with this situation s. 89 (2) provided that such parts of the roll should be deemed never to have come into force, and the consequential alterations in the valuation lists be deemed never to have been made. This must inevitably have resulted in some valuation lists—during the transitional period until pt. III of the Act came into force—containing entries which did not correctly represent the true facts. If in the present case the part of the roll applicable to this hereditament had been completed and the consequential alteration made in the valuation list, the roll would have been deemed never to have come into force and the entry never to have been made. The result would, apparently, have been that the entry of the Air Ministry would have remained.

It would be strange if the result were to be different in cases where the roll has not been completed and no consequential alteration has been made in the valuation list. In such cases there was no need for the legislature to make provision to nullify something that had never taken place. Section 90 makes special provision for hereditaments shown as railway hereditaments on Mar. 31, 1948, but not, in fact, occupied by the Transport Commission, but I can find no provision for the converse case. The meaning of s. 89 (5) (b) is by no means clear, but, in my view, having regard to the opening words of s. 85 and the general scheme of this Part of the Act, the sub-section affords no justification for the inclusion of this hereditament in the provisional list, and apart from this sub-section I can find nothing to qualify the general immunity afforded to railway hereditaments by s. 85. For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

COHEN, L.J. : The question for determination on this appeal is whether the assessment committee were entitled, having regard to the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1948, to include a hereditament known as Euston House, Eversholt Street, London, in a provisional list, to include the name of the Railway Executive as occupiers of the premises, and to demand rates in respect thereof from the Railway Executive. The assessment committee, on July 29, 1948, approved the inclusion of the hereditament in question in a provisional list, No. 177, dated Apr. 5, 1948, but on Jan. 25, 1949, a Divisional Court granted an order of certiorari quashing the determination of the assessment committee. From this decision the assessment committee appeal.

Counsel on both sides agreed that the point was a short one depending purely on the construction of the Local Government Act, 1948, but, in order to arrive at a determination on it, I think it is necessary to see what the position was before that Act came into force. I start with the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, s. 51. Under that section it was the duty of the assessment committee to include in the valuation list every hereditament in their area in accordance with the classes mentioned in sched. III to the Act, class 10 being "Railways, Canals, Docks, Tolls, Waterworks and Gas Works." The form of the valuation list was governed by the London (Valuation Lists) Rules, 1933 (S.R. & O., 1933, No. 785). The list had to show as regards each hereditament, among other particulars, the name of the occupier and of the owner. It was divided into three parts—I, hereditaments other than industrial and freight transport hereditaments, II, industrial hereditaments, and III, freight transport hereditaments. Hereditaments used for railway transport purposes fell, of course, under pt. III of the list, but the question whether or not a hereditament could be included in that part was determined by the Railways (Valuation for Rating) Act, 1930. Under that Act a Railway Assessment Authority was constituted on which was cast the responsibility of preparing, as soon as might be after its constitution and thereafter at intervals of five years, a railway valuation roll showing the net annual and rateable values of every railway hereditament in England. The roll was to be divided into parts, and as soon as the authority had determined the rateable values of the several hereditaments occupied by any railway company they were to complete the part of the railway valuation roll relating to the undertaking of that company. Provision was made for revision of the roll from time to time (see s. 11). The authority were to notify the assessment committees of the completion of a part of the roll, and s. 12 provided that on receipt of any such notice the assessment committee was to cause the values entered in that part of the roll and such other particulars as might be prescribed to be entered in the valuation list in substitution for the values or particulars appearing in that list. "Prescribed" meant prescribed by the Rating and Valuation Acts (Railway Valuation Roll) Rules, 1933 (S.R. & O., 1933, No. 451), which, among other things, required (see r. 12) railway hereditaments to be distinguished by inserting the letter "R" and the number of the hereditament in the roll. After the Act of 1930 came into force, a hereditament could only be included or removed from the list of railway hereditaments as a result of a determination arrived at by the authority appointed under the Act of 1930. The first three rolls required to be prepared under the Act of 1930 were prepared. The fourth roll should have been prepared and come into force on Apr. 4, 1946, but it had, in fact, not been completed by the time the Local Government Act, 1948, came into force.

Before I turn to the history of Euston House, I must state briefly the position as regards properties in Crown occupation. So far as hereditaments outside London were concerned, the position was governed by the Rating and Valuation Acts (Form of Valuation List) Rules, 1932 (S.R. & O., 1932, No. 395), which provided in r. 4 that as regards hereditaments in Crown occupation in respect of which a contribution was made in aid of rates they should be entered in one group at the end of that section of pt. I of the list which related to the parish in question. We were informed that a similar practice was adopted in London, although there were no statutory rules prescribing the adoption of that practice.

I turn now to the history of Euston House. Until 1941 it was occupied by the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co., and was duly entered in pt. III of the list as a freight transport hereditament. During 1941 it was requisitioned by the government. The appropriate steps were taken to remove it from the list of freight transport hereditaments, but, as the Crown made a contribution in lieu of rates in respect of its occupation of Euston House, it had to be entered in the list. It appeared in the supplementary list for 1946 in pt. I, the Air Ministry and the Ministry of Supply being shown as the occupiers. In 1947 the Crown went gradually out of occupation, and by the end of that year the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co. were back in occupation of the whole building. On Jan. 1, 1948, the Railway Executive took over from the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co. When the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co. re-entered into occupation, Euston House should in due course have again been entered in the list as a freight transport hereditament. The assessment committee could not, however, make the necessary correction unless and until the railway valuation roll was amended. It was too late to amend the third roll. The matter could have been put right on the fourth roll, but the preparation of that roll was much in arrears. As a result, the assessment committee could not for the time being recover rates from the Railway Executive nor could they ask a contribution from the Crown. Had the fourth roll been duly completed and become operative, the matter would have been put right owing to the retrospective effect given to amendments by s. 12 (4) of the Act of 1930, but that Act was repealed by the Local Government Act, 1948, and the fourth roll will never be completed.

What, then, is the effect of the Act of 1948 ? Part III contains a new code for valuation and rating procedure, but it did not come into force on the passing of the Act. Power was given to the Minister of Health by s. 72 (1) to fix the day or days on which it was to come into force. We were told that he has exercised that power and that, with certain exceptions, pt. III will come into force on Feb. 1, 1950 : the Local Government Act, 1948 (Appointed Days) Order, 1949 (S.I., 1949, No. 434). Part V, under which the question before us falls to be determined, deals with the rating of transport and electricity authorities. Section 85 (1), so far as material, is in the following terms :

> " Save as is otherwise provided in this Part of this Act, no premises which are or form part of either (a) a railway or canal hereditament (as defined for the purposes of this Part of this Act . . . shall be liable to be rated or be included in any valuation list or in any rate, and the British Transport Commission . . . shall, in the year 1948-49 and all subsequent years, make such payments for the benefit of local authorities as are provided for by the subsequent provisions of this Part of this Act in lieu of the rates which would, apart from the provisions of this Part of this Act, be payable to rating authorities in respect of those hereditaments."

Counsel for the Railway Executive was, I think, right in saying that this sub-section confers on railway hereditaments as defined in the Act absolute immunity from rating except so far as in pt. V itself it is otherwise provided. Section 86 defines a railway hereditament. So far as material, it is in the following terms :

> " (1) In this Part of this Act, except where the contrary is expressly provided, the expression ' railway or canal hereditament ' means a hereditament occupied for any of the purposes of the British Transport Commission specified in sub-s. (2) of this section . . . (2) The purposes referred to in sub-s. (1) of this section (elsewhere in this Act referred to as ' non-rateable purposes ') are (a) all purposes of the parts of the undertaking of the commission which are concerned with the carriage of goods or passengers by rail or inland waterway or the provision of facilities for traffic by inland waterway ; and (b) all purposes of any parts of their undertaking which are subsidiary or incidental to any such part as aforesaid, not being parts thereof concerned with road transport, sea transport or harbours or parts thereof subsidiary or incidental to the parts thereof concerned with road transport, sea transport or harbours."

There follows two provisos with which I do not think we are concerned. There can, I think, be no doubt that the purposes for which the Railway Executive occupy Euston House are " non-rateable purposes " within sub-s. (2) and that as soon as pt. III of the Act comes into force it will be the duty of the new rating authority to treat Euston House as a railway hereditament. Section 87 deals with railway hereditaments partly used for non-rateable purposes and partly for other purposes, and provides that such a hereditament shall not be exempt from rating or from inclusion in a valuation list under s. 85, but shall be included at a fair valuation in respect of its use for purposes other than non-rateable purposes. This, says counsel for the Railway Executive, is the section to which reference is intended by the opening words of s. 85 (1) and it is the only exception to the exemption conferred by that section. Section 88 repeals the Act of 1930 so far as anything material to this appeal is concerned.

I now come to s. 89, on sub-s. (5) of which counsel for the assessment committee relies as containing a provision limiting the operation of s. 85 (1). Section 89 (1) provides that the provisions of pt. V, so far as anything material to the decision of this case is concerned, shall come into force on Apr. 1, 1948, except so far as in sub-s. (2) it is otherwise provided. Sub-section (2) provides that the fourth roll which was in course of preparation under the Act of 1930 should not be completed, that any part of the roll which has been completed should be deemed never to have come into force, and that any alterations made in any valuation list as a result of the preparation of the fourth roll should be deemed never to have been made, and the list corrected accordingly. Sub-section (3) in effect provides that, until other provision is made under pt. III of the Act, all hereditaments shown in the valuation lists on Mar. 31, 1948, as railway hereditaments within the meaning of the Act of 1930 should, subject to s. 90, be treated as railway hereditaments for the purposes of pt. V unless they were shown in the lists as freight transport hereditaments used wholly for purposes which would not be " non-rateable purposes " within s. 86 (2). Sub-section 4 provides that hereditaments which under sub-s. (3) were to be deemed railway hereditaments for all purposes were to be omitted from the lists, unless they were used partly for purposes other than non-rateable purposes, in which case they were to remain on the list, the net annual value being such net annual value as was shown in the list on Mar. 31, 1948, as attributable to the rateable purposes. The exception to sub-s. (4) thus conforms to s. 87 (1). Sub-section (5), which is the corner-stone of the argument of counsel for the assessment committee, is in the following terms :

> " Save as provided in the preceding provisions of this section, and without prejudice to the provisions of the next following sub-section, no alteration shall be made in any valuation list (a) so far as it relates to any hereditament in England or Wales which is by virtue of sub-s. (3) of this section to be deemed to be a railway or canal hereditament ; or (b) for the purpose of securing that any other hereditament in England or Wales is treated as or as part of a railway or canal hereditament, until the provisions of pt. III of this Act relating to the alteration of valuation lists by means of proposals made by or served on valuation officers have come into force."

This sub-section, as counsel for the Railway Executive points out, does not in terms limit in any way the operation of s. 85 (1), but counsel for the assessment committee says that the underlying principle is to stabilise the list of railway hereditaments on Apr. 1, 1948 ; that it was the duty of the rating authority to correct the list by deleting the Crown as occupier ; that, if it omitted Euston House altogether, it would in effect be treating the property as a railway hereditament in contravention of sub-s. (5) ; and that, therefore, sub-s. (5) impliedly authorises the assessment committee in the transitional period to treat Euston House as rateable under pt. I of the list and to treat the Railway Executive as the occupiers.

Before deciding between these rival contentions, I must refer briefly to the other provisions of the Act to which our attention was called. Section 89 (6) prohibits any alteration in the list in force at the date of the passing of the Act (Mar. 24, 1948), so far as that list related to any hereditament shown therein on Mar. 31, 1948, as a railway hereditament, except (i) as provided in the preceding sub-sections of s. 89; (ii) under pt. III of the Act when that comes into force; (iii) under s. 90. Section 90 provides for the removal from the list of railway hereditaments of any hereditament shown as such in the list on Mar. 31, 1948, which is in the occupation of some person other than the British Transport Commission. The section enables the necessary correction to be made in the transitional period prior to the coming into operation of pt. III, but there is nowhere in the Act a corresponding provision authorising an addition to the list of hereditaments during the transitional period. Any correction made under this section has effect as from the beginning of the quinquennial period current at the date of the passing of the Act, or as from the date of the change of occupation, whichever should be the later date. Section 93 deals with the payments to be made in lieu of rates by the British Transport Commission. This contribution during the transitional period until the list prepared pursuant to pt. III comes into force is fixed for 1948-49 at the standard amount (that is, so far as England and Wales are concerned) of £1,810,000, plus a further sum of £630,000, and for each of the next two years at the standard amount adjusted as provided by s. 94. The provisions as to adjustment do not, in my opinion, affect the question we have to decide.

I have now, I think, referred to all the relevant sections of the Act and I return to s. 89 (5) on which the question before us really depends. Counsel for the Railway Executive was, I think, right when he said that the language of that sub-section is peculiarly inapt if the intention was to make a hereditament which is a railway hereditament within the definition in s. 86 rateable as if it were not a railway hereditament. Moreover, I am unable to accept the argument of counsel for the assessment committee that, unless the inclusion of Euston House in pt. I of the provisional list as in the occupation of the Railway Executive is upheld, his clients will be infringing s. 89 (5). If the assessment committee were to omit the premises altogether from the list (and it is unnecessary for me to decide whether they should have done so), they would be omitting the name, not in order to secure that the premises were treated as a railway hereditament, but in order to record the fact that the Crown were no longer in occupation, but, even if they leave the name of the occupier blank in pt. I or substitute the name of the Railway Executive for that of the Crown in pt. I, the Railway Executive would, in my opinion, not be liable to pay rates. To hold otherwise would be in direct conflict with s. 85 (1) in the absence of a provision rendering the premises liable to be rated. Section 89 (5) is restrictive and not enabling, and I am unable to spell an enabling provision out of s. 89 (5) or any other provision in the Act. The effect of s. 89 (3) and (4) was to exclude from pt. III of the list all railway hereditaments appearing therein on Mar. 31, 1948, except so far as any such hereditaments were being used otherwise than for rateable purposes within s. 86 (2). Sub-section (5), in my opinion, merely prohibits the addition to pt. III of any railway hereditament. If the authority were to remove Euston House from pt. I of the list, they would be making that alteration, not for the purpose of securing that Euston House is treated as a railway hereditament, but to show that it is no longer in Crown occupation. They would, therefore, not, in my opinion, be infringing sub-s. (5).

Counsel for the assessment committee pointed out that, if this view were right, the effect would be that until pt. III of the Act of 1948 comes into operation the rating authority would get no rates on those premises and no contribution in lieu of rates. That is true, but this does not seem to me unreasonable, as, if a hereditament ceases to be a railway hereditament owing to change of occupation, the rating authority will be able to get rates on that hereditament through the operation of s. 90 without, apparently, suffering any reduction in the annual contribution to which it is entitled under ss. 85 (1) and 93. This is rough and ready justice, and I see nothing to justify us in placing a strained construction on s. 89 (5) in order to give effect to the contention of counsel for the assessment committee. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The appeal relates to a hereditament known as Euston House, Eversholt Street, London, N.W. Until 1941 that hereditament was occupied by the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co. and it was entered in the valuation list and rated as a railway hereditament. Under the Railways (Valuation for Rating) Act, 1930, it was the duty of the Railway Assessment Authority to arrive at the net annual value of a railway undertaking by reference to the average net receipts of the company, and thereafter to apportion the value among the hereditaments occupied by the company, calculating the rateable value of every such hereditament by reference to its net annual value. They prepared the Railway Valuation Roll, and particulars had to be sent to the various bodies and persons affected. By s. 12 assessment committees were charged with the duty of making entries in the valuation list to correspond with those in the valuation roll—in other words, they had no duties in connection with the valuation of a railway hereditament. They took the figures of the Railway Assessment Authority, and each such hereditament appearing in the valuation list had to be distinguished by the letter " R " : r. 12 of the Rating and Valuation Acts (Railway Valuation Roll) Rules, 1933. In 1941 the Crown requisitioned the hereditament and retained possession until 1947. On June 30, 1947, the London, Midland and Scottish Railway Co. resumed possession and since that date the hereditament has been occupied by them (or by their successors, the Railway Executive) for railway purposes. It is common ground that it is a railway hereditament within the definition in the Local Government Act, 1948, s. 86 (1) : see para. 5 of the affidavit of the clerk to the assessment committee. During the occupancy of the Crown, the hereditament was not rateable, but a contribution to the rates was made by the Crown based on a rateable value of £10,000 (later reduced to £7,660). In the valuation list of 1946 the hereditament appeared as " Not assessed. See government property." On Apr. 5, 1948, the rating authority made a provisional valuation list showing the Railway Executive (London Midland Region) as occupiers and inserting the figure of £10,000 as the net annual and rateable value. Objection on behalf of the Railway Executive was taken to this and also to similar entries in a supplemental valuation list which was made later. The objections were duly heard by the assessment committee, who decided against the Railway Executive. The decision as to the provisional list is conveyed by letter of July 30, 1948, in which it is stated that " they decided to make no alteration in the figures proposed in the list." The decision as to the supplemental list, 1948, was that " they decided to disallow the objection and to confirm the proposals of the rating authority " (letter of Nov. 4, 1948). These decisions were followed by demands for rates for two half-yearly periods amounting to £4,166 13*s.* 4*d.* and £4,052 10*s.* 3*d.* respectively. The Railway Executive succeeded before the Divisional Court in obtaining an order of certiorari to quash the determination of the assessment committee. The assessment committee appeals to this court and asks that the judgment of the Divisional Court be set aside and that the order of the assessment committee be restored. There is nothing in the documents before the court to show what figures were in the valuation list before the occupation by the Crown. At that time the value would be an apportioned part of the net annual value of the railway undertaking arrived at by reference to the net annual receipts.

There arises a question of some difficulty under the Local Government Act, 1948, and, in particular, under ss. 85-90 of that Act. These sections are in pt. V of the Act, which Part, so far as is material, came into operation on Apr. 1, 1948, that is, before the provisional list was made. The Act of 1948 brings about a complete change in rating practice generally, and, by pt. V, a departure from the system of rating of transport and electricity authorities which has prevailed for some little time. Railways were acquired by the State as from Jan. 1, 1948, and one of the main purposes of pt. V of the Act was to free them from rateability, the State making payments for the benefit of local authorities in lieu of rates, and the sums so paid are to be distributed by the Minister of Health among rating authorities in England and Wales in proportion to the rateable values for their respective areas for the year. The freedom from rating is given by these words in s. 85 (1) :

> " Save as is otherwise provided in this Part of this Act, no premises which are or form part of (a) a railway . . . hereditament (as defined for the purposes of this Part of this Act) . . . shall be liable to be rated or included in any valuation list or in any rate . . ."

Section 86 contains the definition of " railway hereditament ", and it is admitted that the words of the definition cover the hereditament in question. Accordingly, the claim of the Railway Executive is that these premises, being a railway hereditament, are not liable to be rated and ought not to be included in the valuation list or in any rate. The case for the assessment committee is based on s. 89 of the Act, a section which gives rise to some difficulties of construction. It provides in sub-s. (1) that this Part of the Act, so far as is material, is to come into force on Apr. 1, 1948 (the Act had received the Royal Assent on Mar. 24). The remaining sub-sections contain provisions which are mainly transitional. Part III of the Act set up a new scheme of valuation for rating purposes under which valuation lists are to be prepared and amended by officers of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, thus bringing about a different system both within and without the metropolis. Part III, with certain exceptions, comes into operation on Feb. 1, 1950 : see s. 72 (1) and the Local Government Act, 1948 (Appointed Days) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 434).

Section 89 (2) provides that the quinquennial railway and London transport valuation rolls in course of preparation are not to be completed, and that any part which had been completed shall be deemed never to have come into force, and further that alterations be made in valuation lists to bring them into line. The result of this was to keep in operation the old valuation rolls and to ensure that entries in valuation lists were in accordance with the entries in the old valuation rolls. By sub-s. (3) it is provided :

> " Until other provision is made under Part III . . . the hereditaments . . . which, on Mar. 31, 1948, are shown in the valuation lists as railway hereditaments . . . shall . . . be deemed to be railway . . . hereditaments for the purposes of this Part of this Act "

(with a proviso as to s. 90). By sub-s. (4) the hereditaments which under sub-s. (3) are to be deemed railway hereditaments are to be omitted from valuation lists, and it is the duty of all assessment committees to cause the necessary alterations to be made with effect as from Apr. 1, 1948.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., appears to have formed the view that the result of sub-s. (3) is to set up another class of hereditaments which are to be deemed to be railway hereditaments, but which are not occupied by or for the purposes of the British Transport Commission. It is a little difficult to see why they should be deemed to be railway hereditaments if they were not occupied for railway purposes and occupied by the Transport Commission. Moreover, s. 90 is expressly designed to secure that a hereditament appearing in the list as a railway hereditament and which, on Mar. 31, 1948, is in the occupation of some person other than the Transport Commission shall cease so to appear. My impression is that the object of, or behind, s. 89 was to lighten the task of those who had to work the scheme during the transitional period. It was not necessary, the framers of the section considered, for them to go into the precise user of every hereditament claimed to be a railway hereditament. If a hereditament was on the old valuation roll, and, consequently, on the valuation list (as corrected), as a railway hereditament, it was to be deemed to be one and it was to be dealt with under sub-s. (4). It may be that the object was to make the entries in the valuation lists exclusive during the transitional period, as counsel for the assessment committee submitted. There is, however, nothing in the Act which so provides, nothing which says that only those hereditaments which are to be deemed to be railway hereditaments shall be treated as such for the purposes of s. 85.

The strongest argument put forward on behalf of the assessment committee is based on s. 89 (5) :

> " Save as provided . . . no alteration shall be made in any valuation list (a) so far as it relates to any hereditament . . . which is by virtue of sub-s. (3) of this section to be deemed to be a railway . . . hereditament; or (b) for the purpose of securing that any other hereditament . . . is treated as or as part of a railway . . . hereditament."

It is said, and said with force, that this hereditament was not on the old valuation roll, and, consequently, not on the existing valuation list, as a railway hereditament, and that to take it off the valuation list altogether would be to offend against sub-s. (5) (b) in that it would be done for the purpose of securing that " any other hereditament is treated as a railway hereditament." It was argued that you could not have a kind of floating hereditament and that this one must appear somewhere, and that, as there was no other way provided, it was the duty of the rating authority and of the assessment committee to include it in the manner in which it appears in the provisional and supplemental lists, once it was seen that government occupation had ceased. It may well be said that s. 89 (5) (b) conflicts with s. 85 (1) (a), for, if a hereditament is a railway hereditament under the latter, it is not liable to be rated, and it ought not to be included in any valuation list, yet, if, perchance, it is on the list and if it does not fall within s. 89 (5) (a), the provision in s. 89 (5) (b) operates to prevent its being taken off for the purpose of securing that it is treated as a railway hereditament.

It seems to me that the answer to the problem can be put in one of two ways, possibly in both. (i) The desire of the Railway Executive is to avoid paying rates in respect of their occupation of this railway hereditament. They are entitled to say : " We do not mind what you do with your valuation list, but Parliament has declared by ss. 85 and 86 that this hereditament is not liable to be rated. We wish to establish that and to show that the demands made on us are unwarranted." (ii) It is not a case of seeking to get something done or some alteration made under s. 89 (5) (b) for the purpose of securing that " any other hereditament is treated as a railway hereditament." If an alteration is made in the valuation list, it will be made to bring it in accord with the facts and not to secure any particular treatment. By reason of s. 85 it is freed from rates. In other words, this is not a hereditament which is to be deemed to be a railway hereditament under s. 89 (3). Everyone agrees that it is a railway hereditament as defined by s. 86, and there is no need for reference to hereditaments which are to be deemed to be railway hereditaments.

It is necessary, of course, to bear in mind the words at the commencement of s. 85 : " Save as is otherwise provided in this Part of this Act." I do not think that this can be read as meaning that only hereditaments which are to be deemed to be railway hereditaments under s. 89 can be said to be railway hereditaments. If that had been intended, words to that effect would have appeared somewhere. They do not. On the other hand, pt. V commences with s. 85, which gives freedom from rating to a railway hereditament as defined by s. 86, and ss. 87 and 90 show sufficient reason for the commencing words of s. 85. I would dismiss the appeal. I find nothing in pt. V of the Act to take this hereditament out of the status given to it by s. 85 and, that being so, the occupiers are entitled to succeed in their contention that it is not liable to be rated. I confess to a feeling of doubt as to the appropriate form of order, but no question has been raised as to this, and I am satisfied that the figures in both provisional and supplemental valuation lists should be struck out.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

ELCOCK AND ANOTHER v. THOMSON.

[King's Bench Division (Morris, J.), May 18, 19, 23, 24, July 1, 1949.]

Insurance—Fire insurance—Amount recoverable—Basis of calculation—Mansion partly destroyed by fire—Agreed value in excess of actual value.

By a Lloyd's policy, dated Nov. 22, 1940, a mansion was insured against loss or damage by fire and the underwriters agreed to pay or make good to the assured a stated fraction of all loss or damage to the property insured caused by perils insured against. The agreed value of the mansion was £106,850, and a clause in the policy stated that that sum " has been accepted by the underwriters and the assured as being the true value of the property insured and in the event of loss the said property will be assumed to be of such value and will be assessed accordingly." On May 16, 1947, part of the mansion was destroyed by fire, the cubic content of the portion burnt being just over 21 per cent. of the whole. The actual value of the mansion before the fire was £18,000, and its value after the fire was £12,600. In an action for the amount due on the policy :

Held : the agreement as to value applied in the event of partial destruction as well as in the event of total destruction ; the depreciation could not properly be determined by having regard merely to the proportion to the whole structure of the part burnt out ; and the sum due to the assured should be arrived at by applying to the agreed value of £106,850 the percentage of actual depreciation resulting from the fire. As the value of the mansion had fallen, as a result of the fire, from £18,000 to £12,600, there was a depreciation of £5,400, or thirty per cent., and the underwriters were liable to pay an amount representing thirty per cent. of £106,850 (namely, £32,055).

Action on a policy of insurance in respect of damage caused by fire.

The plaintiffs had an interest in a Lloyd's fire policy of insurance on a mansion, B which had been partially destroyed by fire. The defendant was one of the underwriters who had subscribed the policy. The value of the mansion was agreed in the policy at £106,850, but the court found that its actual value was £18,000 before the fire and £12,600 after the fire. The cost of constructing after the fire the whole mansion in the form in which it was before the fire would have been £205,000, and reinstatement after the fire in that form, which had C not been undertaken, would have cost £40,252. The defendant admitted liability, but disputed the amount due under the policy. The plaintiffs contended that the amount should be : (a) the difference between the agreed value of £106,850 and the value of the mansion after the fire ; or, alternatively, (b) a percentage of the agreed value of £106,850 equal to the percentage of the depreciation in value shown by comparing the actual value of the mansion after D the fire with its actual value beforehand ; or, alternatively, (c) the cost of reinstatement. The defendant contended that the amount should be (a) the actual depreciation in value ; or (b) a percentage of the agreed value of £106,850, equal to the percentage which the cost of reinstatement represented of the cost of constructing a new mansion. Morris, J., held that the amount due under the policy should be arrived at by applying the percentage of depreciation in E actual value to the agreed value. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 1. MORRIS, J., read the following judgment. In order to adjudicate on the claim presented in this case it is necessary to determine what is the F sum appropriate to be paid under a valued policy of insurance in respect of damage to a mansion caused by fire. The mansion is at Easthampstead Park, near Wokingham, Berkshire, and was formerly the property of the Marquis of Downshire. The defendant and other underwriters subscribed a Lloyd's fire policy by the terms of which the true value of the mansion (together with kitchens and adjoining premises) was agreed as being £106,850. The Lloyd's G fire policy was dated Nov. 22, 1940, and by its terms the marquis was insured against loss or damage to the property described in the policy in respect of certain risks which included that of fire. It was stipulated that the underwriters' liability was "to insure from loss or damage" by fire and lightning, £174,870, being part of £180,440, property described in a schedule attached to the policy. Subject to this partial limitation, the underwriters agreed to pay H or make good to the assured all loss or damage caused by perils insured against that might happen to the subject-matter of the insurance. The property covered by the policy was described by items in the schedule. In addition to the mansion house many other houses and cottages and farm and other buildings were covered. The schedule contains in all 206 items of property, and opposite each item, as described, is set out the sum insured. Item No. 1 was described as :

> "The building, including stained glass window on stairs and a hot water apparatus set in basement therein, for heating said mansion by radiators and a domestic hot water boiler also in basement, both heated by automatic plant by Oilmatic Co. with storage tank for crude oil."

The figure in the column headed "sum insured" is the figure of £100,000. Item No. 2 covers kitchens, scullery, larders, laundry, pump room, and other
A things and fittings, and under the heading "sum insured" the figure was £5,000. Items 3, 4 and 5 covered adjoining premises, really forming part of the mansion house, including a coal house, storehouse, carpenter's shop, bath house, and conservatory. The total of items 1-5 was £106,850. At the end of the schedule are the words:

> "The sum set opposite each item in this specification has been accepted
> B by the underwriters and the assured as being the true value of the property insured and in the event of loss the said property will be assumed to be of such value and will be assessed accordingly."

The fire at the mansion took place on May 16, 1947. The cubic content of the mansion, together with the part of it known as the wing, was 990,260 cubic feet. The mansion had about 75 rooms, 42 of which were bedrooms. The
C cubic content of the portion that was burnt was 209,000 cubic feet. This represented a percentage of just over 21 per cent. of the whole. In mentioning this, it may be convenient here to state that I am satisfied that the measure of the depreciation in value of the mansion which was caused by the fire cannot properly be determined by having regard merely to the proportion to the whole structure of the part that was burnt out. If reinstatement of the damage at a
D date a few months after the fire had been possible, the cost of such reinstatement, excluding architects' and surveyors' fees, would have been £40,252. With the inclusion of such fees the cost would have been £43,252. If, at about that date, the whole building were being erected so as to be in the form in which it was before the fire, the cost would have been £205,000.

The mansion was in the occupation of the marquis at the outbreak of the war in E 1939. During the war and until Nov. 8, 1946, it was in the occupation of St. Paul's Junior School, though during the war years the marquis retained a few rooms for his personal occupation. By a memorandum dated Mar. 5, 1946, signed, as to one part, by the marquis and, as to the other part, by the plaintiff, Mr. William George Elcock, it was agreed between them that Mr. Elcock was the purchaser from the marquis of the freehold of the mansion, together with
F other property, on the conditions set out in the memorandum, including the National Conditions of Sale (13th ed.). In making the agreement the plaintiff acted as agent and trustee for the plaintiff company, Farming Supplies (Berkshire), Ltd. The property sold included the home farm and also cottages and other lands. The total acreage was 1,306. The purchase price was £40,000. Prior to this purchase the plaintiff, Mr. Elcock, had purchased eleven lots of G outlying land at Easthampstead for £11,960. The total purchases were, therefore, at a cost of £51,960. Sub-sales took place of some of the property purchased and in connection with these sub-sales direct conveyances were made by the marquis to the sub-purchasers with the consent of the plaintiff, Mr. Elcock. There was a conveyance dated May 23, 1947 (i.e., just a week after the fire), by which the mansion house and other property, including farmhouses, cottages,
H outbuildings, and about 782 acres of land, were conveyed to the plaintiff company. The price recorded in that conveyance was simply the figure remaining owing to the marquis out of the total sum of £51,960. I am satisfied that the figure cannot be regarded as forming any real guide to the value of the mansion at the date of the conveyance. The sub-sales made by the plaintiffs yielded them a profit.

In July, 1946, the underwriters were informed of the interest of the plaintiff in the policy, and later in 1946 the underwriters agreed with the marquis and with the plaintiff, Mr. Elcock, that the policy should be extended until the date of completion of the purchase. There is no doubt that the plaintiff, Mr. Elcock, was interested in the policy as agent and trustee for the plaintiff company, and that in respect of the mansion, the plaintiff, Mr. Elcock, continued to be so interested until after the date of the fire. The defendant does not dispute liability under the policy, but he challenges both the basis on which quantification of the amount of the claim is made and also the valuations asserted by the plaintiffs. The competing submissions as to valuation, both in regard to questions of law and in regard to questions of fact, resulted in the putting forward of various figures involving wide ranges of separation between them. Witnesses who gave evidence as to values recorded opinions which considerably diverged.

[His Lordship reviewed the facts of the case and the evidence of value, and found that the reasonable value before the fire to the plaintiffs of the mansion together with 104 acres was £28,400, and that a reasonable division of this figure was made if £18,000 were allowed for the mansion and £10,400 for the remainder comprising the 104 acres. His Lordship continued :] In my judgment, the value of the mansion with the 104 acres after the fire was £23,000. The appropriate division of this figure is made if £12,600 be allowed for the mansion and £10,400 (the same figure as before) be allowed for the remainder comprising the 104 acres. The result is that, in my judgment, the mansion was of a value of £18,000 before the fire, and of a value of £12,600 after the fire. The mansion should for this purpose be regarded as being the entirety comprising items 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the schedule to the policy of insurance.

Counsel for the plaintiffs presented alternative formulations of claim. In the first place, he submitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the difference between the amount of £106,850 and whatever amount was found by the court to represent the value of the mansion after the fire. Alternatively, he submitted that the actual value of the mansion before the fire should be assessed and also the actual value after the fire, and that the percentage of depreciation should then be applied to the agreed or conventional value of £106,850, so as to produce a resulting figure which would be the amount recoverable. As a further possible method of claiming, he submitted, alternatively, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover a sum representing the cost of reinstatement of the mansion, but he did not put forward this basis very strongly. The main submission of counsel for the defendant was that the principles which would apply if there were a claim under a valued policy of marine insurance and if a ship which was insured was damaged were principles that could and should be applied in adjudicating on the present claim. He submitted that the interpretation of s. 69 (3) of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, was that, if a ship covered by a valued policy was damaged but not lost, and if it was not repaired, recovery under the policy should be limited to a sum representing the actual depreciation in value caused by the casualty. As an alternative submission he contended that recovery should be limited to the percentage of the agreed value of £106,850 which the cost of reinstatement represented of the cost at about the date of the fire of the construction of a new mansion. Thus he contended that the cost of reinstatement, i.e., £40,252, represented 19.635 per cent. of £205,000, i.e., the cost at about the date of the fire of the construction of a new mansion similar to the one that existed. This alternative contention, therefore, was that the sum to be awarded should be limited to 19.635 per cent. of £106,850. Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that there is no reason for taking the analogy of the rules governing a policy on a ship rather than the rules relating to goods, and he referred to the reasoning of Lord Mansfield in Lewis v. Rucker (1). Alternatively, he submitted that, if, contrary to his contention, s. 69 (3) of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, could be regarded as directing the way to principles applicable in this case, such section ought not to be regarded without reference also to s. 27 (3) of that Act.

I pass now to consider what is the basis on which the claim should be allowed. When parties have agreed on a valuation, then, in the absence of fraud or of circumstances invalidating their agreement, they have made an arrangement by which, for better or for worse, they are bound. As ATKIN, L.J., said (126 L.T. 444) in City Tailors, Ltd. v. Evans (2) :

> "... in a valued policy, what is valued is the subject-matter of the insurance, and not the amount of the loss."

He pointed out that in marine insurance the position is made clear by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 27 (2) and (3), which read :

> " (2) A valued policy is a policy which specifies the agreed value of the subject-matter insured. (3) Subject to the provisions of this Act, and in the absence of fraud, the value fixed by the policy is, as between the insurer and assured, conclusive of the insurable value of the subject intended to be insured, whether the loss be total or partial."

It was not in dispute between the parties that the policy in this case is properly to be regarded as a valued policy. When losses occur after parties to contracts of insurance have agreed on values, then in some cases advantage may occur to the assured while in others advantage may occur to the insurer : see North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Assocn. v. Armstrong (3). In Irving v. Manning (4) in the House of Lords, the assistance of the judges was sought and a question was put to them on which their answer was desired after the arguments addressed at their Lordships' Bar were heard. PATTESON, J., who, in the absence of PARKE and ALDERSON, BB., stated the answer of the judges, said in the course of the opinion (1 H.L. Cas. 305) and in reference to a valued policy on a ship :

> " By the terms of it, the ship, etc., for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and assurers, are and shall be rated and valued at £17,500, and the question turns on the meaning of these words. Do they, as contended for by the plaintiff in error, amount to an agreement that for all purposes connected with the voyage, at least for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a total loss or not, the ship should be taken to be of that value, so that when a question arises whether it would be worth while to repair, it must be assumed that the vessel would be worth that sum when repaired ? Or do they mean only, that for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of compensation to be paid to the assured, when the loss has happened, the value shall be taken to be the sum fixed, in order to avoid disputes as to the quantum of the assured's interest ? We are all of opinion that the latter is the true meaning ; and this is consistent with the language of the policy, and with every case that has been decided upon valued policies."

At the end of the opinion, PATTESON, J., said (ibid., 307) :

> " A policy of assurance is not a perfect contract of indemnity. It must be taken with this qualification, that the parties may agree beforehand in estimating the value of the subject assured, by way of liquidated damages, as indeed they may in any other contract to indemnify."

Counsel for the defendant did not dispute that, if the mansion had been entirely destroyed by fire, the agreed valuation would become the measure of the indemnity to be paid by underwriters, but he argued that, as the mansion was only damaged, the agreed valuation should not enter into the assessment of the amount payable by underwriters. His argument was in the main based on a contention that, under the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 69 (3), the amount payable under a policy of marine insurance, where a ship is damaged and has not been repaired or sold in her damaged state, would be the amount of the depreciation. Section 69 (3) is :

> "Where the ship has not been repaired, and has not been sold in her damaged state during the risk, the assured is entitled to be indemnified for the reasonable depreciation arising from the unrepaired damage, but not exceeding the reasonable cost of repairing such damage, computed as above."

Counsel for the defendant contrasted this sub-section with s. 71 (3)—in reference to goods—which reads :

> "Where the whole or any part of the goods or merchandise insured has been delivered damaged at its destination, the measure of indemnity is such proportion of the sum fixed by the policy in the case of a valued policy, or of the insurable value in the case of an unvalued policy, as the difference between the gross sound and damaged values at the place of arrival bears to the gross sound value."

Counsel for the defendant submitted that, as there is no express mention of valued policies in s. 69 (3), the result should follow that, in the case of a partial loss of a ship, payment under a policy of insurance should be made without regard to any agreed valuation. He submitted that a fire policy, being a contract of indemnity closely resembling a marine policy, should be similarly construed and he relied on passages in the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Castellain v. Preston (5) in support of his contention that the two types of policy should be similarly regarded.

In dealing with these contentions, as counsel for the plaintiffs pointed out, it is first to be observed that the statutory provisions of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, do not apply to this case, but, if those provisions are to be looked at in order to seek guidance on principle, then I am not prepared to accept the validity of the contentions of counsel for the defendant. Section 69 (3) of the Act uses the words "is entitled to be indemnified for the reasonable depreciation." Those words do not fix the measure of such indemnity. They do not lay it down that the parties' agreed valuation is to be ignored. They certainly do not provide that s. 27 (3) of the Act is to be disregarded. Indemnification for reasonable depreciation must, in my judgment, take into account any agreed valuation. Such agreed valuation is the corpus out of which depreciation takes place and by reference to which the depreciation must be measured. Furthermore, in my judgment, there is nothing in s. 69 (3) which is inconsistent with, or which overrides, what was laid down in Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co. (6) and Balmoral Steamship Co. v. Marten (7). In Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co. (6) the view of LINDLEY, J., and of the majority in the Court of Appeal was that, if the owner of a ship which is injured by perils insured against does not repair the ship but sells her during the continuance of the risk, he can recover from underwriters for the depreciation in value of the ship and can arrive at the measure of the underwriters' liability by applying the proportion of depreciation caused by the casualty to the value as agreed in the policy. In his speech in the Balmoral case (7) LORD LINDLEY said ([1902] A.C. 521):

> "The notion prevalent at one time, and supported by the high authority of Mr. Benecke, that although the valuation in a policy is conclusive in the case of a total loss, yet that in the case of a partial loss the valuation may be opened, has long been exploded . . ."

After referring to certain textbooks, he continued (ibid.) :

> "There are numerous decisions showing this to be the case in valued policies on goods and freight (the most recent being The Main (8)), and I am unable to discover any reason for applying to ships a doctrine repudiated as unsound when applied to goods or freight. At the same time, I have not discovered any direct decision on this point. The principle that a valuation in a policy on ships is to be regarded in cases of partial loss was > assumed to be correct in Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co. (6), and was not questioned on appeal. The owners, however, contend that the underwriters have no concern with the mode in which the amounts payable for losses insured against are arrived at. The owners say they are fully insured up to a certain limit, and that if that limit is not exceeded all losses insured against must be fully paid. This, my Lords, appears to me to ignore the difference between valued policies, as understood in this country, and open policies, and to be erroneous according to English law."

There appears to be no decided case which affords conclusive authority in regard to the issues raised in this action. Some guidance in principle can, however, be derived from the decisions in cases where insured ships have sustained partial loss. In my judgment, on the facts of the present case the assured are entitled to be indemnified in respect of the depreciation which was caused by the fire, and, in quantifying such depreciation, the insurable value of the mansion as agreed by the parties cannot be set aside and disregarded. I observe that, at the end of the schedule to the policy, in the words by which such agreement as to value is expressed, it is stipulated that in the event of loss the property would be assumed to be of the value recorded and would be assessed accordingly. In the body of the policy the words used are " to insure from loss or damage." I have considered whether any significance is to be attached to the fact of the use only of the word " loss " at the end of the schedule and whether it could be argued that the agreement as to value was only to apply in the event of the destruction or loss of an item as opposed to damage occurring to it. No such point was, however, taken or argued and I cannot imagine that any significance attaches to the use only of the word " loss." It would be strange and unnatural if an agreed value were to apply only in the event of complete destruction and not in the event of partial destruction. The respective words " loss " and " damage," as used in the policy, seem to be synonymous. It would not seem to be the case that the word " loss " in only referable to complete destruction. Apart from this, however, the opening words of the provision, viz., the words " The sum set opposite each item in this specification has been accepted by the underwriters and the assured as being the true value of the property insured," appear to contain agreement as to value irrespective of the meaning of the word " loss " which is later used.

Although in the case of item No. 1 in the schedule to the insurance policy, viz., the mansion, the actual value is shown to have been far less than the agreed value, it must have been the case that the agreed values of other items were far below their actual values in 1947. Thus, without specifying any particular item, a house whose agreed valuation was £2,000 may very well in 1947 have actually been worth £6,000. If such a house had been totally destroyed, underwriters would only have been liable to pay £2,000. If damage by fire resulted in a depreciation in actual value from £6,000 to £2,000, and if actual repairs were not effected, underwriters would, I imagine, have contended that they were only liable to pay two-thirds of £2,000, whereas, on the contention of counsel for the defendant, they would be liable to pay more. If repairs are actually done, and done in a reasonable way and at a reasonable cost, it may be that underwriters are liable to pay the cost of them up to the extent of their liability under the policy. Further, it may be that, if repairs are not done, but could be done at a figure representing less than the underwriters' liability on the basis of depreciation, then underwriters could limit their liability to the lower figure. Thus, if the agreed valuation of a house was £2,000 and its actual value was £1,000, and if it was damaged so that its actual value became £500 but it could be repaired for £500, it may be that the underwriters' liability would be £500. As the questions which I have posed do not call for present determination, I express no final opinion in regard to them, but I have considered it desirable to have them in mind when examining and testing the submissions made to me. It may well be that, if £43,252 had, in fact, been expended in repairing the damage done, underwriters would have been liable to pay this amount, subject only to the application of the fraction prescribed by the policy. It is not, however, necessary to express any concluded view in regard to this.

The result is that, in my judgment, the percentage of actual depreciation resulting from the fire should be applied to the agreed values as set out in the policy so as to arrive at the amount recoverable. On my findings, the mansion was worth £18,000 before the fire and £12,600 after the fire. There was, therefore, a depreciation of £5,400 in £18,000, or a depreciation of 3 in 10. By "the mansion" I mean the entirety described in items 1 to 5 of the schedule, which together had an agreed value of £106,850. The loss or damage which occurred to the plaintiffs was, therefore, 3/10ths of such figure, namely £32,055. Underwriters are, therefore, liable to pay an amount representing the stated fraction of this sum and the defendant will be liable for his proportion. There will be judgment accordingly.

[His Lordship then considered a claim by the plaintiffs for interest and decided not to order the payment of interest.]

Re DUNN (a Bankrupt). Ex parte OFFICIAL RECEIVER v. DUNN.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), July 12, 13, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Adjudication—Debtor's petition—Doubt as to enforceability of creditor's claim—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 6 (1).

The Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 6 (1) provides: "A debtor's petition shall allege that the debtor is unable to pay his debts . . . and the court shall thereupon make a receiving order." By s. 29 (1): "Where in the opinion of the court a debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt, or where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may, on the application of any person interested, by order annul the adjudication."

A bookmaker claimed from a debtor a sum of £1,610 arising out of gaming transactions. The debtor disputed the claim and agreed that, in consideration of the bookmaker taking no proceedings against him, the dispute should be referred for adjudication to the Northern Bookmakers' Protection Association, by whose decision the debtor agreed to be bound. The association decided that the debtor should pay the sum claimed, and, the debtor having failed to pay, the bookmaker issued a writ for £1,610, contending that the case was not within the ambit of the Gaming Act, 1845, but that, in view of the submission of the dispute to the association and the latter's decision, there was a binding contract to pay. The debtor filed a petition in bankruptcy and was adjudicated bankrupt. There were no other debts. After the making of the receiving order the bookmaker intimated that he would not prove in the bankruptcy, the debt, as a gaming debt, not being provable, but he declined to release the debtor from the alleged liability. The official receiver thereupon applied that the adjudication might be annulled on the ground that the debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt since, when he filed his petition, he was not unable to pay any legally enforceable debt within s. 6 (1).

HELD: (i) in deciding whether the order ought to have been made the court must have regard to the state of affairs existing at the date of the order; in so doing it was entitled to take into account facts which appeared from evidence subsequently filed; but it was not entitled to take into account facts which had occurred since the date of the order.

(ii) as it was not shown that the writ for the sum claimed must have been set aside as disclosing no cause of action, the court was not entitled to say that the order ought not to have been made.

Per DENNING, L.J.: I do not think that the enforceability of the debt is the test. Even if the debt was unenforceable, nevertheless, if the debtor honestly believed on reasonable grounds that he was unable to pay his debts the adjudication was good and should not be annulled ab initio.

APPEAL by the official receiver from a decision of the Divisional Court sitting in Bankruptcy (ROMER and JENKINS, JJ.), dated May 9, 1949, refusing an application by the official receiver to annul the bankruptcy of the debtor on the ground that the debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Aronson, K.C., for the official receiver as trustee in bankruptcy.
Lodge for the debtor.
Maurice Berkeley for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The debtor, Harry Dunn, embarked on some speculative dealings with bookmakers, as a result of which a claim was made against him by one, Pat Clarke, for the sum of £1,610. A letter dated Nov. 26, 1947, which the debtor signed and was addressed to Mr. Clarke, was in these terms:

> "In consideration of your refraining from taking any proceedings against me either in the police court or county court, I the undersigned hereby agree that the dispute between us shall be adjudicated upon by the Bookmakers' Protection Association, and I hereby further agree that I will be bound by their decision. It is further agreed that pending such decision I shall not be posted as a defaulter."

The evidence does not disclose the exact nature of the dispute alluded to in the letter, but it is clear that the Northern Bookmakers' Protection Association did purport to adjudicate between Mr. Clarke and the debtor and the effect of their adjudication was that the debtor should pay Mr. Clarke the sum of £1,610. On Aug. 31, 1948, a writ was issued in the High Court, Middlesbrough District Registry, Mr. Clarke being the plaintiff and the debtor being the defendant. The statement of claim on the writ was as follows:

> "The plaintiff's claim is for £1,610 as being payable under an agreement made by the defendant with him. Particulars. 1. As the result of betting transactions between the plaintiff and defendant the defendant owed to the plaintiff the sum of £1,610. 2. On Nov. 26, 1947, the defendant by letter addressed to the plaintiff and in consideration of the plaintiff refraining from taking any proceedings against him agreed that the matter > in dispute should be adjudicated upon by the Bookmakers' Protection Association and agreed to be bound by their decision, and it was part of the said agreement that the defendant would not be posted as a defaulter. 3. The Northern Bookmakers' Protection Association, Ltd., adjudicated on the matter in dispute and found that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff the sum of £1,610 and the decision was communicated to the defendant." A

Then it was alleged that the defendant had failed to pay. On Sept. 13, 1948, the debtor, having had that writ served on him, and having assets which consisted of a life policy for £50, and £10 in cash, filed his own petition in bankruptcy pursuant to s. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. By s. 6 (1) it is provided that "A debtor's petition shall allege that the debtor is unable to pay his debts," and the petition did so allege in those terms without further particulars, that B being the normal procedure and practice under the section. By the section the effect of the presentation of the petition was that it was deemed an act of bankruptcy, and the sub-section goes on to provide that "the court shall thereupon make a receiving order." The court did so, and adjudicated the debtor a bankrupt on the same day.

The present application, which is by way of appeal from the Divisional C Court in Bankruptcy, is that the court should annul the bankruptcy pursuant to s. 29 of the Act of 1914. Sub-section (1) of that section provides:

> "Where in the opinion of the court a debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt, or where it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the debts of the bankrupt are paid in full, the court may, on the D application of any person interested, by order annul the adjudication."

It is conceded by counsel for the official receiver, the trustee in bankruptcy, that this case must stand or fall under the first limb of the sub-section, in other words, this is a case in which, as he says, the debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt. It is to be observed that the power of the court in s. 29 (1) is discretionary—"the court may . . . by order annul the adjudication." E The registrar declined to annul it, and the same view was taken by ROMER and JENKINS, JJ., sitting as a Divisional Court. This court in any case would be reluctant to interfere with the exercise of the discretion of two courts below, but it is claimed that the discretion was exercised in misapprehension of the true inferences to be drawn in this case and so resulted in the incorrect application of the principles which should be applied under s. 29. It is said F that, unless it can be shown that when the debtor presented the petition he truly alleged that he was unable to pay his debts, the order should not have been made. I think the official receiver must go so far as to say that the court, in the circumstances of this case, must annul the bankruptcy.

The first point which leaps to the eye is this. Having regard to the circumstances in which Mr. Clarke became an alleged creditor of the debtor, is it G true to say that the debtor was unable to pay his debts since, as appears from the statement which he himself filed of his affairs, the only debt which he owed was this sum of £1,610? The point made by counsel for the official receiver is that the £1,610 was purely a gaming debt and would have been irrecoverable in any court of law. He has, therefore, invited us to say that, since the only debt on the footing of which the order was made was a gaming H debt, and, therefore, not a debt at all, the whole foundation for the exercise of the court's powers under s. 6 is removed, and no order for adjudication should have been made.

I have read the writ issued by Mr. Clarke in full because it has been necessary to consider what on the face of the writ is the claim. If the matter stood as stated in para. 1 of the particulars alone, it would manifestly follow that there was here no legally enforceable debt, but merely that, as a result of betting transactions, the defendant owed £1,610. Paragraph 2, however, introduces into the particulars the letter which I have earlier read. That letter, undoubtedly, purported to create a new and valid consideration for a promise on the part of the debtor to pay what, if anything, the Bookmakers' Protection Association should decide he, the debtor, owed to Mr. Clarke. No doubt, therefore, the view was entertained by Mr. Clarke and his advisers that, as the result of that letter, the case was taken out of the ambit of the Gaming Act, 1845, and the debt became enforceable. That view was expressly stated by them in a letter addressed to the official receiver on Oct. 14, 1948, in which they said : " We contend there is a binding contract to pay the amount of this claim," and referred to Whiteman v. Newey (1), a decision of the Divisional Court in 1912. Whether or not that contention is right seems to me to be a matter which, at any rate, requires some investigation. It is to be observed that one party to the alleged debt, namely, the creditor, Mr. Clarke, is not now before the court. If it was so clear on the face of the writ that we could say that there is manifestly no debt which is enforceable and the writ is really a piece of waste paper, it might be right for the court to say : " There never was a debt and the order which was made on Sept. 13, 1948, adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt ought not to have been made because the statement that he could not pay his debts has been shown to be inaccurate." That, however, is going much further, as it seems to me, that we are entitled to go. However doubtful the success of Mr. Clarke's claim might be it is a matter requiring some argument. It is understandable that on the issue of the writ the debtor might well have been advised that the case was not within the ambit of the Gaming Act, 1845. He might have been seriously perturbed about what he ought to do. To plead the Gaming Act and fight the action was obviously a matter causing expense beyond the limits of his financial resources.

It seems to me, therefore, that the learned judges in the court below were right in saying that on the face of that writ they could not say that there was here, beyond all doubt, no debt at all. In a passage much relied on in the judgment of ROMER, J., he said this :

> " As far as I can see, the matter really depends on whether, at the date when the receiving order was made and the adjudication was made, it can truly be said that the debtor ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt. It seems to me one has to examine the position as it then appeared to be and ascertain and determine whether that position was one under which a receiving order and adjudication could properly be made or could not properly be made. I do not think one would be very materially assisted in that enquiry by anything that has transpired since. At the time when the debtor filed his petition and the order in bankruptcy was made, the debtor had received the writ—he got it some weeks previously—the creditor showed every intention of pressing his claim, and the debtor knew that he could not pay. I am not clear that on the face of this specially endorsed writ there was no case for the debtor to answer."

He gives some reasons for that and concludes this part of his judgment by saying :

> " All that I think it is necessary to decide in this case is whether or not it was plain at the date when the debtor filed the petition that he was under no present or prospective liability to the plaintiff in this case, and I am unable to say that it is plain that he was not."

I entirely agree with ROMER, J., as did JENKINS, J., that here, to use his words, it was " not clear that on the face of this specially endorsed writ there was no case for the debtor to answer." I think, if I may venture a criticism of the language used, it is, perhaps, not entirely correct to say that the matter ought to be adjudged in the light of the facts as they appeared to be at the date when the receiving order was made, namely, Sept. 13, 1948. I think counsel for the official receiver is right in saying that, in judging whether the order ought to have been made, the court is entitled to have regard to the actual state of affairs at the date of the order, which may appear from evidence subsequently filed, and certainly would not appear from the bare statement on the formal petition which alone was before the court when the order was made. I do not think, however, that one is entitled, in determining whether the order ought to have been made under the first limb of the sub-section, to take into account facts which have occurred after the date of the order. I say that because after the order had been made a communication was received from the solicitors to the bookmaker, Mr. Clarke, to the effect that they did not propose to prove in the bankruptcy. They have even gone so far, according to the evidence, as to intimate that they appreciate it would not be a provable debt, though they have expressly declined to release the debtor from it. The fact that a creditor after adjudication may release the debt could not, I think, prima facie affect the question whether the order ought, in the first instance, properly to have been made. I will go a little further and say that I am not satisfied that it must be affirmatively shown that there were at the date of the bankruptcy debts which were enforceable and from which there was no escape. I think on the facts here shown, when the debtor was faced with the claim on the writ for £1,610, and when it is not shown—as I think it is not shown—that that writ must have been set aside as being mere waste paper, then the court is not entitled to say that this order ought not to have been made.

I venture to reinforce that by a short reference to one of the cases cited, namely, Ex parte Painter, Re Painter (2). It is unnecessary to refer to the facts, but I think it clearly emerges from that case that the circumstance that the debtor has filed his petition in order to protect himself from evils which he might otherwise suffer and not with any benevolent intention of benefiting his creditors by securing a fair distribution of assets among his creditors is no reason why an order should not be made. It is to be observed that, should this order be annulled, any outstanding claim which existed at the date of the order and which had not been paid off in the meantime would remain alive. It seems to me that nothing has occurred which would prevent Mr. Clarke then proceeding on his writ. Certainly the fact that this court (in Mr. Clarke's absence) took the view that his claim was unenforceable would not prevent him. The debtor might, if he defended the action, raise the appropriate defences and dispose of the claim, but he might have to fight at considerable cost to himself. There is nothing, I think, in the policy of the Act of 1914 which disentitles a debtor to say : " I will go bankrupt and protect myself from these possibilities and get rid, whether or not they be provable debts, of any claims which are made against me." In my view, there is no ground for saying that that attitude amounts to an abuse of the process of the court and no ground for saying that, without amounting to an abuse of the process of the court, it can be treated as sufficient reason for the court exercising its powers under s. 29 and annulling the order. For these reasons, which I have added to what was said in the court below, and with all respect to the forcible argument of counsel for the official receiver, I conclude that this appeal should fail.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

DENNING, L.J. : Counsel for the official receiver urged strongly that here there was no debt which was enforceable in the courts, and that on that ground the adjudication should be annulled. He said it would be a misuse of bankruptcy proceedings if they were allowed to be used in cases where there was no enforceable debt. It is probably correct to say that here there was no enforceable debt. If the matter was fully investigated it would probably be found that the bookmaker's claim was not enforceable, for, assuming that Hyams v. Stuart King (3) is still good law,* there was no fresh and real consideration such as would fall within it. I do not think, however, that the enforceability of the debt is the test. Even if the debt was unenforceable, nevertheless if the debtor honestly believed on reasonable grounds "that he was unable to pay his debts" the adjudication was good and should not be annulled ab initio. The debtor was not versed in the nice distinctions that have been drawn about Hyams v. Stuart King (3), and I do not suppose his solicitor was. Mr. Clarke's solicitor relied on a case which gave considerable colour to the claim, and the proper inference from the evidence is that the debtor honestly believed on reasonable grounds that this debt was enforceable at law, and he knew he could not pay it. In that belief he properly filed his petition and was properly adjudged a bankrupt. In those circumstances it is not a case which falls within s. 29 of the Act of 1914. It cannot be said that he ought not to have been adjudged bankrupt. It now turns out, indeed, that there are no debts, but that only means that the bankruptcy proceedings will have to be wound up. This will have the result that the debtor will get his discharge free from any possibility of a claim by the bookmaker. If the bankruptcy were annulled it would mean that a claim could be still made against him. I agree the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. No order as to costs.

THORPE v. FASEY.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), July 6, 7, 8, 1949.]

Sale of Land—Contract—Breach—Damages—Repudiation—Evidence—Rescission—Payment of purchase price by instalments—Conveyance of portion of land as each instalment paid—Failure to pay instalments.

By an agreement dated Aug. 3, 1937, the vendor (representing a syndicate) agreed to sell and the purchaser to buy certain land of an area of 157 acres for £38,000, of which £1,400 was to be paid as a deposit on the signing of the agreement. The agreement provided by cl. 2 that, first, as to the land edged pink on the plan numbered 2 annexed to the agreement the purchaser was to pay the vendor £12,600 as further part of the purchase money on or before Oct. 3, 1937. Secondly, cl. 2 provided that, as to the land edged green on plan No. 2, on or before Oct. 3, 1939, the purchaser should pay the vendor £8,000 as further part of the purchase money. Thirdly, as to the land edged yellow on the said plan, on or before Oct. 3, 1940, a further sum of £8,000 as further part of the purchase money was to be paid; and, fourthly, as to the land edged blue on the same plan, on or before Oct. 3, 1941, a further sum of £8,000 representing the balance of the purchase money should be paid. Each of the plots delineated on the plan was of about 40 acres. It was provided that on each payment of the money at the time appointed the vendor would execute and hand to the purchaser a conveyance of the land in respect of which the payment should be made and would give to the purchaser vacant possession of the land. There was a provision enabling the purchaser to complete his purchase of a portion of the land prior to the date applicable to that portion, and providing for an apportionment of the purchase money. If the purchaser should make default in payment of any of the instalments or in payment of any interest under the agreement for 21 days after it had become due, the whole of the unpaid instalments of the purchase price with the interest thereon was to become immediately due and payable. Clause 4 provided for the payment of interest from Oct. 3, 1937, on such part of the purchase money as was outstanding. Clause 5 provided that if and whenever the purchaser should make default in the payment of the balance of his purchase money or any interest for a further period of 21 days from the date when such balance and interest should have become immediately due and payable under the foregoing provisions, or should fail to perform any other condition or provision of the agreement, then, if the purchaser failed to remedy the breach within 21 days after a notice from the vendor requiring him to do so had been served, the deposit was to be forfeited, and the vendor was to be at liberty (without prejudice to any other remedies which he might have) to re-sell the property and to re-enter and take possession.

* Hyams v. Stuart King was overruled by the House of Lords in Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (July 29, 1949), reported post.

The purchaser paid the deposit of £1,400 and the further sum of £12,600, and the land edged pink on the plan was conveyed to him by a conveyance dated Oct. 27, 1937. He began to develop the land, but, owing to competition and the international situation, he found himself in financial difficulties and was unable to pay the first of the three instalments of £8,000. Owing to the war and restrictions on building, he made no further payment. The vendor brought no pressure to bear on the purchaser during the war, when the property had been occupied, and latterly requisitioned, by the military authorities, but in correspondence between May, 1945, and March, 1947, the vendor pressed for measures towards completion to be taken, although in each letter it was suggested by him that the purchaser should either complete or put forward other proposals, short of completion, acceptable to the vendor, who would treat them as a variation of the contract. Early in 1946 the purchaser received notice that the local authority had applied to the Minister of Town and Country Planning for consent to the revocation of the interim development permission granted to the purchaser in respect of the land. On Mar. 13, 1947, the vendor wrote suggesting a meeting and asking for information as to the purchaser's proposals " for the purpose of effecting an early completion of the purchase." The purchaser replied that he had not yet heard from the Minister the result of the application of the local authority, and that as soon as he did so he would attend a meeting. On July 1, 1947, the vendor notified the purchaser that he had instituted the present proceedings for damages for breach of the agreement of Aug. 3, 1937, and for rescission. In February, 1948, the Minister of Town and Country Planning authorised the revocation of the interim development permission. The vendor claimed damages for breach of contract, or rescission of the contract. A claim by him for specific performance was not pursued.

Held : (i) the correspondence did not disclose an intention on the purchaser's part to abandon the contract, nor did it indicate that any sufficient notice before action brought had been given to the purchaser by the vendor that, if the purchase money were not paid within a certain time, the contract must be considered at an end, and, therefore, there had been no repudiation of the agreement by the purchaser which could be accepted by the vendor, whose claim for damages must, therefore, fail.

(ii) on the true construction of the agreement it was a single contract for the purchase of one lot for a certain sum of money and not a series of contracts for four separate lots, and, therefore, as that part of the agreement which concerned the land edged pink on the plan had been superseded by the conveyance of Oct. 27, 1937, restoration of the status quo was impossible, and rescission must be refused.

Hunt v. Silk (1804) (5 East 448) and Sheffield Nickel Co. v. Unwin (1877) (2 Q.B.D. 214), applied.

Per cur.: There is no good reason for a distinction, nor does there exist any distinction, between the nature of the repudiation which is required to constitute an anticipatory breach of contract and that which is required where the alleged breach occurs after the time for performance has arisen.

ACTION by a vendor for specific performance of an agreement dated Aug. 3, 1937, for the sale of certain freehold property forming part of a property known as Montreal Park, near Sevenoaks. The vendor also claimed damages in addition to specific performance. Alternatively damages for breach of contract were claimed, or, in further alternative, rescission of the agreement.

The purchaser admitted that he could not resist a claim for specific performance, but the vendor decided not to pursue that claim. The remaining claims were dismissed. The terms of the agreement and the facts relating thereto are set out in the headnote, and the remaining facts appear fully in the judgment.

Gray, K.C., and Elverston for the vendor.

R. W. Jennings, K.C., and Hewins for the purchaser.

WYNN-PARRY, J., stated the facts and continued: I now turn to the law. The action is curious in the respect that at the trial counsel for the vendor stated at an early stage that he did not propose to pursue the claim for a decree of specific performance for the reason that, as I think appears clearly on the correspondence and was affirmed clearly by the purchaser's evidence, any such decree would not bear fruit. On the other hand, counsel for the purchaser admitted that he was not in a position to resist a decree for specific performance and, were the vendor to press for it, he would have nothing to say in opposition. However, that remedy is not pressed for, and I need not say anything more about it.

The vendor has mainly pressed his claim for damages at law on the ground that the purchaser has broken the contract. It is not, of course, every breach of a contract that will give rise to damages, and as regards the damages which are asked for under this head the only breach that will support such a claim is a breach which amounts to a repudiation by the purchaser of the contract, the repudiation being accepted by the vendor. For that purpose I think it must be shown that an essential term of the contract has been broken. The term in question is the failure to complete. In equity that is a failure which is not necessarily fatal to the contract, for equity takes the view that failure to perform the contract on the day fixed is not a failure going to the root of the contract unless the parties have made time of the essence of the contract. At common law the position is somewhat different. In WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 994, it is said : A B

> " A breach of contract may be committed, not only by the failure to perform some obligation under the contract at the time when it ought to be fulfilled, but also by the renunciation of performance of the contract ; and this may occur in two ways. If either party absolutely refuses, or if by his own act he makes it impossible for him to carry out his part of the agreement, the other is entitled at his election either to treat such renunciation of performance as a breach of contract, and at once to rescind or sue upon the contract accordingly, or else to treat the agreement as still subsisting, wait till the time is gone by for the renouncing party to perform the acts promised, and then sue him for the breach occasioned by such non-performance." C

I think it is clear from the language used in that passage that the first alternative, " to treat such renunciation of performance as a breach of contract, and at once to rescind or sue upon the contract accordingly" has reference to an anticipatory breach. It was thought to draw a distinction between the nature of the repudiation which is necessary to amount to an anticipatory breach and the nature of the repudiation which it would be sufficient to show in the case of a breach arising after the time for performance has arrived. D E

As regards anticipatory breach, it will be sufficient if I refer to Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co. (1), a case of such a breach. LORD SELBORNE, L.C., there said (9 App. Cas. 438) :

> " Upon the other point, I do not think it desirable to lay down larger rules than the case may require, or than former authorities may have laid down for my guidance, or to go into possible cases differing from the one with which we have to deal. I am content to take the rule as stated by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Freeth v. Burr (2) which is in substance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other ; you must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part ; and I think that nothing more is necessary in the present case than to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything of that kind has taken place here." F G H

Cornwall v. Henson (3) was not a case of anticipatory breach. In that case the defendant, in August, 1892, agreed to sell some land to the plaintiff for £150, of which £40 was paid at the time, and the balance was to be paid by twelve equal quarterly instalments of £9 3*s.* 4*d.* each. In case of default for thirty days in the payment of any instalment, the whole of the unpaid instalments were to become immediately due and payable and the vendor was to be at liberty to re-sell the land, retaining out of the proceeds of sale the unpaid instalments with interest and paying the balance to the purchaser. The purchaser went into possession under the contract, and retained possession for a considerable time, and, though generally in arrear with the instalments, he had by August, 1895, paid them all, except the last. The last instalment became due on Sept. 29, 1895, but it was never paid. Correspondence took place in which the vendor called on the purchaser to pay, but he never gave him notice that, if payment was not made within a specified time, he should treat the contract as abandoned. In October, 1896, the purchaser went away, and the vendor was unable to find him. The vendor resumed possession of the land and endeavoured to sell it, but without success, and in March, 1898, he agreed to let it for three years to a tenant who took possession. In June, 1898, the purchaser re-appeared, and wrote to the vendor that he was prepared to pay the final instalment. In July, 1898, the purchaser commenced an action against the vendor, claiming specific performance of the agreement of August, 1892, and damages in lieu of or in addition to specific performance. It was held that the purchaser's conduct did not amount to a repudiation of his contract and that the vendor was not justified in treating the contract as abandoned, and that, though the purchaser was not entitled to specific performance of his contract, he was entitled to damages, which the court assessed at £125. There was an argument on a particular clause of the contract, and having referred to that, SIR RICHARD WEBSTER, M.R., said ([1900] 2 Ch. 302) :

> "It is not, I think, necessary to decide whether that contention is well founded, for in the view which I take of the facts the vendor was not justified in treating the purchaser as having abandoned his contract. I think it is plain that the vendor never brought to the mind of the purchaser, so long as they were in communication with each other, that if he did not pay the last instalment the vendor would treat the contract as abandoned."

Having reviewed the evidence, the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS continued :

> "I cannot find any intention on the part of the plaintiff to abandon the contract, or that any sufficient notice was given to him by the vendor that, if the last instalment was not paid within a specified time, the contract must be considered as at an end."

Finally, on this aspect of the matter, I must refer to Harold Wood Brick Co., Ltd. v. Ferris (4), which did not involve any consideration of an anticipatory breach. It was a case in which the parties had made time of the essence of the contract. It concerned an agreement to purchase certain freehold land and buildings together with the machinery, plant and utensils thereon, and cl. 15, the material clause, provided for completion on Aug. 31, 1933, with an option to the defendant to complete earlier at a less price, and it proceeded :

> "If for any reason the actual completion of the purchase is delayed beyond Aug. 31, 1933, then nevertheless on that date the purchase money . . . shall be placed on deposit . . . but the purchase shall in any event actually be completed not later than Sept. 15, 1933 . . ."

The court treated that clause as making completion of the purchase on Sept. 15, 1933, of the essence of the contract. The court affirmed the judgment of SWIFT, J., and GREER, L.J., said ([1935] 2 K.B. 205) :

> "For these reasons, SWIFT, J., was right in the conclusion he arrived at, and it is not necessary to enter into the question whether if time had not been of the essence of the contract the conduct of the purchaser when pressed to keep himself up to date would have been sufficient to indicate that he would not be able to perform his contract. If one party indicates by his conduct that he is unable or unwilling, whatever time he is given, to perform his contract, that is sufficient to justify an acceptance of the repudiation and to entitle the other party to damages, and I base my judgment on the fact that a term which was of the essence of the contract has been broken by the appellant and therefore he is liable for the damages given against him.

ROCHE, L.J., said (ibid., 208) :

> "... I agree that the purchaser, the defendant, had by Nov. 13 failed to complete the purchase and had made it plain that he was unable or unwilling to do so then or at all."

In my judgment, when one considers these cases there is no good reason for a distinction, nor, in my view, does there exist any distinction, between the nature of the repudiation which is required to constitute an anticipatory breach and that which is required where the alleged breach occurs after the time for performance has arisen. What, then, is the result of that view on the present case ? It is true that in the present case the vendor did not, as he could have done, make time of the essence of the contract. That is not fatal to his case, if he can demonstrate that the evidence discloses that the purchaser is unable or unwilling, whatever time is given, to perform his contract, or, adopting the words of ROCHE, L.J., that he is unable or unwilling to do so at all. Therefore, the matter comes down to the somewhat fine question what is the true view of the relevant letters in the correspondence, read in the light of those authorities. Before the issue of the writ there had been a certain amount of pressure brought by the vendor on the purchaser to complete, but on each occasion there was the alternative presented to the purchaser either to complete or to put forward other proposals which, short of completion, " we shall treat as satisfactory and which if accepted will amount in effect to a variation of the contract." Then come these two letters—that on Mar. 13, 1947, where the vendor's solicitors still ask that there should be a meeting for the purpose of discussing proposals, and the reply stating the willingness of the purchaser and his advisers to arrange a meeting, but desiring to defer that meeting until the decision of the Minister of Town and Country Planning should be known. In those circumstances it appears to me that the words of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in Cornwall v. Henson (3) apply and that it is not possible, on a fair reading of this correspondence, to find any intention on the part of the purchaser to abandon the contract or that any sufficient notice before action brought was given to him by the vendor that, if the outstanding purchase money was not paid within a specified time, the contract must be considered at an end. Therefore, I find that there was not a repudiation of the contract by the purchaser and, therefore, no repudiation which could be and was accepted by the plaintiff. In my judgment, therefore, the claim of the vendor for damages at common law fails.

I must then consider the question of the alternative claim for rescission. On this aspect of the matter there is surprisingly little authority. I was referred to Hunt v. Silk (5), the side-note to which is :

> " A agreed, in consideration of £10 to let a house to B, which A was to repair and execute a lease of within ten days, but B was to have immediate possession, and in consideration of the aforesaid was to execute a counterpart and pay the rent. B took possession and paid the £10 immediately, but A neglected to execute the lease and make the repairs beyond the period of the ten days, notwithstanding which B still continued in possession : Held, that B could not, by quitting the house for the default of A rescind the contract and recover back the £10 in an action for money had and received, but could only declare for a breach of the special contract ; for a contract cannot be rescinded by one party for the default of the other, unless both can be put in statu quo as before the contract ; and here B had had an intermediate possession of the premises under the agreement."

The case in the court below came before LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J., who (5 East 449) "thought that the plaintiff was too late to rescind the contract, and that his only remedy was on the special agreement, and, therefore, directed a nonsuit." The case came before the court on an application for a new trial. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, who presided, then said in the course of his judgment (ibid., 451):

> "Where a contract is to be rescinded at all, it must be rescinded in toto, and the parties put in statu quo. But here was an intermediate occupation, a part execution of the agreement, which was incapable of being rescinded. If the plaintiff might occupy the premises two days beyond the time when the repairs were to have been done and the lease executed, and yet rescind the contract, why might he not rescind it after a twelvemonth on the same account. This objection cannot be gotten rid of: the parties cannot be put in statu quo."

As I read that judgment, it contains a statement of what LORD ELLENBOROUGH regarded as a well established general principle that where a contract is to be rescinded it must be rescinded in toto and the parties put in statu quo, and he follows that general statement with its application to the facts of the particular case, ending with a reiteration of the essential elements that must exist as a condition precedent for the granting of a relief of rescission, namely, that the parties should be capable of being put in statu quo.

Sheffield Nickel and Silver Plating Co., Ltd. v. Unwin (6) concerned, inter alia, the sale by the defendant to the plaintiff company of certain businesses and patents for which the defendant was to receive some fully paid shares and some money payments. He was to guarantee the shareholders a minimum dividend and he paid them the necessary money to make up the minimum dividend at the end of the first year. A resolution was passed by the directors and carried at a general meeting whereby the defendant was released from the guarantee on surrendering his shares and giving up to the company his rights to the patents. He retired from his office as director, giving up his shares and right to the patents, and the company proceeded to sell one of the businesses and one of the patents. The company afterwards claimed to set aside the resolution and enforce the guarantee on the ground that the defendant had fraudulently misdescribed the property sold by him. A Divisional Court consisting of MELLOR and LUSH, JJ., having held that the resolution was not in excess of the powers of the company and was binding on them, proceeded to say that, assuming that the resolution had been passed in consequence of fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the defendant, his position had been so far changed that it was too late for the company to repudiate their contract. LUSH, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, said (2 Q.B.D. 223):

> "A contract voidable for fraud cannot be avoided when the other party cannot be restored to his status quo: Clarke v. Dickson (7). For a contract cannot be rescinded in part and stand good for the residue. If it cannot be rescinded in toto, it cannot be rescinded at all; but the party complaining of the non-performance, or the fraud, must resort to an action for damages."

There, again, the language used indicates that the court there intended to pray in aid a well established general principle that a contract cannot be rescinded in part and stand good for the residue. If it cannot be rescinded in toto it cannot be rescinded at all, and one reason for not directing rescission is that the parties, or one of them, cannot be restored to their status quo. I was also referred to the decision of FARWELL, J., in Mussen v. Van Diemen's Land Co. (8). That case, as I understand it, cannot be said in any degree to whittle down the generality of the principle which was stated and relied on in the two cases to which I have referred because of the special terms of the bargain made between the parties and, indeed, the learned judge did not have to deal with this aspect of the matter at all, but was concerned whether the retention by the defendant in that case of a sum specified in the contract was or was not in the nature of a penalty. In my view, therefore, that case does not affect the present matter at all.

It is surprising, but that would appear to be the only result of the diligent researches of the four counsel who have been engaged in this case, and I must proceed on the basis of those authorities. I was referred to a passage in Williams on Vendor and Purchaser, 4th ed., vol. 2, p. 1006, which clearly proceeds on the basis of the existence of the general principle which, in my view, emerges from the two cases before me. I must, therefore, applying that principal, refuse rescission in this case unless I can come to the conclusion that the true way of viewing the position is that the contract which must be the subject of rescission is the residue of the agreement of Aug. 3, 1947, remaining after that part of it which concerns the land edged pink has been superseded for all purposes by a conveyance of Oct. 27, 1937. It was argued that, looked at properly, this agreement was for the sale of four plots of land and amounted to this, that the first lot was to be sold for £12,600 (I will leave out of account the deposit) and the remaining three parcels for £8,000 each, there being a separate completion date as regards each parcel of land. Against that, the first clause opens with the words :

> "The vendor shall sell and the purchaser shall purchase at the price of £38,000 whereof the sum of £1,400 shall be paid to the vendor on the signing hereof as a deposit and the balance shall be paid at the times and in the manner hereinafter provided."

Those are the words which indicate, prima facie at any rate, that what is being dealt with is a single sale for a single purchase price, the subject-matter of the sale being dealt with in parcels and the purchase price being payable by instalments as each parcel is conveyed. Some colour appears to me to be lent to that by the provision in cl. 2 that the purchaser may complete his purchase of any part of any of the outstanding areas, in which case there is provision for an apportionment of the purchase money. Further, there is the proviso at the end of that clause which says :

> "Provided further that if the purchaser shall make default in payment of any of the said instalments of the purchase price or in the payment of any interest payable hereunder for 21 days after the same shall have become due the whole of the unpaid instalments of the purchase price with the interest thereon shall become immediately due and payable."

That indicates that what the contract is dealing with is a single transaction with a single purchase price, split in the manner provided in cl. 2. Again, in cl. 4, providing for payment of interest, reference is made to payment of interest "and such part of the purchase money as shall for the time being remain owing." Finally, there is the very significant circumstance that whereas the four areas specified on plan No. 2 are all approximately of the same acreage, each about 40 acres, the purchase price is so spread that, apart from the deposit, which was a deposit as a guarantee of the performance of the agreement, the defendant has had to pay as the first instalment £12,600 in respect of the pink edged plot which is only 40 acres.

In my view, on the true construction of this document, it is impossible to say that it is a document containing a series of contracts. It is a document evidencing a contract to buy for a total price of £38,000 157 acres of land, the contract to be worked out by the splitting of the land into four equal areas and the attribution of an unequal sum to one area and the attribution of three equal smaller sums to the other three areas. Therefore, it is not possible to say that when the conveyance of the pink land was carried out there remained a contract which could stand by itself, so far as the relief of rescission was concerned. Taking that view of the contract, which I feel bound to take on its true construction, and having such guidance as I have in the authorities, in my judgment, the relief of rescission is not open to the vendor in this case. For those reasons I must refuse the vendor relief under both heads which he claims, and dismiss the action with costs.

Action dismissed with costs.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), June 29, July 13, 1949.]

Will—Revocation—Revocation by marriage—Will made in exercise of power of appointment granted by settlement—Settlement providing that in default of appointment property to pass to those entitled on intestacy had the testator died without being married—"Person entitled as . . . next of kin under Statute of Distributions"—Testator's widow—Wills Act, 1837 (c. 3), s. 18.

The Wills Act, 1837, s. 18, provides: "Every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage (except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when the real or personal estate thereby appointed would not in default of such appointment pass to his or her heir, customary heir, executor, or administrator, or the person entitled as his or her next of kin under the Statute of Distributions)."

On Nov. 29, 1890, the testator, H.G., executed a settlement in contemplation of marriage which provided that, in the event of there being no children of the marriage, he should have a general power of appointment in a moiety of the trust fund to be exercised by will, and that, in default of the exercise of this power, such moiety should be held "in trust for such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto under the statutes for distribution of the personal estates of intestates on the death of the said H.G. had he died possessed thereof intestate and without having been married." In 1902 the testator's wife died, there having been no children of the marriage. By a will dated Nov. 23, 1910, the testator exercised the power of appointment as to £500 in favour of his executors, so that such sum should form part of his personal estate, and as to the remainder in favour of his nephews and nieces. In 1912 the testator married again and in 1916 he died. In 1946 his second wife died. On a motion of a surviving niece and the personal representatives of other nephews and nieces of the testator for a grant to the surviving niece of letters of administration with the unrevoked portion of the will annexed, it was contended that, on a true construction of s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, that portion of the will exercising the power of appointment remained unrevoked by the second marriage.

HELD: (i) the words "next of kin under the Statute of Distributions" in s. 18 were intended to include the widow of the testator, the intention of the section being that a will exercising a power of appointment should only be wholly revoked by the subsequent marriage of the testator in those cases in which the instrument creating the power provided that in default of appointment the fund should devolve as on an intestacy, in which event the widow of the testator would take her portion of the fund.

(ii) since, by the terms of the settlement, the widow was excluded from the portion of the fund to which she would have been entitled on intestacy, the estate would not pass to the next of kin in accordance with s. 18 and the material portion of the will, therefore, was not revoked by the testator's subsequent marriage. MOTION for a grant of letters of administration with the unrevoked portion of a will annexed.

It was contended by the appointees under the testator's will, by which he exercised a power of appointment granted him by a settlement, that the material portion of the will was unrevoked by the testator's subsequent marriage, since by the terms of the settlement the property did not pass, in default of appointment, to the persons entitled as the testator's next of kin within the meaning of s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837. Cur. adv. vult. E

July 13. PILCHER, J., read the following judgment. This matter comes before the court on the motion of one surviving niece and the personal representatives of a deceased niece and two deceased nephews of the testator, the late Mr. Harry Gilligan, for a grant to the surviving nieces of letters of administration with the unrevoked portion of a will made by the testator, dated Nov. 23, 1910, annexed. F

The facts of the case, which are complicated, are very fully set out in the Case on Motion. I will endeavour to summarise them here as shortly as possible. On Nov. 29, 1890, the testator made a settlement of certain funds in contemplation of his marriage. The settlement provided for the usual life interests for the testator and his wife with trusts over for any children of the marriage. It further provided that, in the event of there being no children of the marriage, the testator should have a general power of appointment over one moiety of the trust fund to be exercised by will, and that, in default of the exercise of this power, such moiety of the trust funds should be held " upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the other equal moiety " namely : G

> " In trust for such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estates of intestates on the death of the said Harry Gilligan had he died possessed thereof intestate and without having been married." H

There were no children of the marriage, and on Feb. 28, 1902, the testator's wife died. On Nov. 23, 1910, the testator made his last will, by which he exercised the power of appointment over the first moiety of the fund granted to him under the settlement of Nov. 29, 1890, in favour of his nephews and nieces, and, as to £500 thereof, in favour of his executors, so that such sum should form part of his personal estate. In 1912 the testator married again. He made a second settlement in contemplation of this marriage. There were no children of this second marriage, and on Mar. 11, 1916, he died. By the second settlement he had granted to his second wife a life interest in the settled fund, but he never made any will after his second marriage. His second wife survived him for thirty years, dying on Feb. 1, 1946. On the death of the testator's second wife, the trust fund became divisible in accordance with the provisions of the settlement of Nov. 29, 1890, and, accordingly, the question whether the said will of the deceased was altogether revoked by his subsequent marriage, or whether the appointment therein made pursuant to the first settlement was, by reason of the saving provisions of s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, unrevoked became an immediate question.

The successors of the appointees under the testator's will and the successors of the second wife contend that, on a true construction of s. 18 of the Act of 1837, that portion of the testator's will by which he exercised powers of appointment granted to him by the first settlement remains unrevoked by his second marriage and that the first moiety of the trust fund passes to them under his will. On the other hand, the successors of those entitled to any part of the estate of the deceased of which he died intestate (other than the second wife) contend that the will was altogether revoked and that the first moiety accrued and is held on the trusts declared in the said settlement concerning the second moiety.

The question was first raised shortly after the death of the testator and an application was made to the Principal Probate Registry on Sept. 11, 1917, by Mr. George Gilligan (who was then one of the trustees of the first settlement) that the will should be brought into the registry in order that he and his co-trustee (or one of the said appointees) might apply for a grant of letters of administration with the said will annexed. The will was, in fact, pursuant to an order of the registrar made on Sept. 11, 1917, brought into and remains deposited in the Principal Probate Registry.

> "Every will made by a man or woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage (except a will made in the exercise of a power of appointment, when the real or personal estate thereby appointed would not in default of such appointment pass to his or her heir, customary heir, executor, or administrator, or the person entitled as his or her next of kin under the Statute of Distributions)."

As I understand it, the meaning of s. 18, so far as I need consider its terms for the purposes of the present case, is that the only exception to the rule that a will is wholly revoked by subsequent marriage is in so far as such will exercises a power of appointment, and then only when the instrument conferring on the testator the power of appointment provides that, in default of the exercise of the power by him, the fund which is the subject-matter of the power shall devolve other than to the next of kin of the testator under the Statute of Distributions, 1670.

The power of appointment which the testator purported to exercise by his will was conferred on him by the settlement of Nov. 29, 1890. The material terms of the settlement provided, in effect, that, in default of the exercise by the testator of the power of appointment granted to him, the trust fund should pass to the person or persons who would on his death have been entitled to it under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates had he died intestate and without having been married. These last five words make it clear that, in default of the exercise of the power of appointment granted to him, the parties to the deed did not intend any widow of the testator to take the share to which she would otherwise have been entitled under the statutes of distribution. To this extent, therefore, the provisions of the settlement make it clear that, in default of appointment, the widow shall be excluded from the portion of the fund to which she would have been entitled on an intestacy. It would seem, therefore, that the words in the settlement " and without having been married " necessarily involve that the estate will not, to use the words of s. 18 of the Wills Act, " in default of such appointment pass to . . . the person entitled as his . . . next of kin under the Statute of Distributions " provided that a widow can be properly called a " next of kin under the Statute of Distributions."

In Garrick v. Lord Camden (1), the testator, David Garrick, by the residuary clause in his will, provided that the residue of his estate was " to be divided amongst my next of kin as if I had died intestate." It was held that the testator's widow was not one of his " next of kin " in the ordinary sense or in the sense in which the testator must be taken to have used the words. In that case LORD ELDON, L.C., said (14 Ves. 382) :

> " . . . it is competent to, and required from, the court to look through the whole will ; and to see, whether from the whole an intention is manifested to include the wife among those, who are to be taken more strictly as next of kin : a description prima facie excluding her."

Having reviewed the position of the widow under the other provisions of the will, LORD ELDON arrived at the conclusion that, in all the circumstances, it would be wrong to conclude that the testator had intended his widow to take any part of the residue, and that, as a widow is not " of kin " to a deceased husband, Mrs. Garrick was not entitled to any share of the residue.

I was informed that there was no reported decision as to the meaning to be given to the words " next of kin under the Statute of Distributions " in s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837. Looking at the Statute of Distributions, 1670, the words " next of kindred " are used several times. Section 1* provides for orders being made for the distribution of estates, after payment of debts, etc. :

> " . . . amongst the wife and children, or children's children if any such be or otherwise to the next of kindred to the dead person in equal degree . . ."

Section 3, after providing for the distribution of the estate to the wife and children, concludes :

> " . . . and in case there be no children nor any legal representatives of them, then one moiety of the said estate to be allotted to the wife of the intestate, the residue of the said estate to be distributed equally to every of the next of kindred of the intestate who are in equal degree and those who legally represent them."

Section 4 of the Act contains a further passage in which a clear distinction is drawn between the wife and the " next of kindred " of the intestate. Looking, therefore, at the wording of the Statute of Distributions, it would not be unreasonable to assume that in using the words " next of kin under the Statute of Distributions," the framers of the Wills Act, 1837, intended that a will exercising a power of appointment should be wholly revoked by a subsequent marriage if the instrument conferring on the testator the power of appointment provided, as did the settlement of Nov. 28, 1890, that, in default of appointment, the fund should pass to those who would have been entitled to it under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates had the testator not been married or died a widower—that is, to his true next of kin to the exclusion of his widow.

While it is not strictly material for my purpose, it is interesting to observe that the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, which repeals the Statute of Distributions, 1670, provides by s. 50 (1) as follows :—

* The sectional numbering of the Statute of Distributions, 1670, is as given in HALSBURY'S STATUTES, vol. 5, pp. 115, 116.

> " References to any Statutes of Distribution is an instrument inter vivos made or in a will coming into operation after the commencement of this Act, shall be construed as references to this Part of this Act ; and references in such an instrument or will to statutory next of kin shall be construed, unless the context otherwise requires, as referring to the persons who would take beneficially on an intestacy under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act."

It would seem, therefore, that in documents to which this section applies references to statutory next of kin will now be construed as including widows.

I was referred to In the Goods of Russell (2). In that case, on facts somewhat similar to those which I have had to consider in the present case, BUTT, J., granted administration with the will annexed to the widow of a testator who had before marriage exercised by will a power of appointment where the instrument creating the power provided that in default of appointment the fund should be divided amongst the testators' brothers and sisters who were, in fact, his true next of kin. It appears to have been assumed in that case that the words in s. 18 of the Wills Act, " next of kin under the Statute of Distributions ", included the widow, and on this basis BUTT, J., decided the case as he did. The point that the widow was not " next of kin " under the Statute of Distributions was not argued, or, apparently, considered, but the court without argument accepted the proposition that the words of s. 18 of the Wills Act, 1837, " next of kin under the Statute of Distributions " are not confined to persons who are strictly " of kin " to the testator, but include a widow who is entitled to her portion on an intestacy.

Although no argument was addressed to the point, I am naturally influenced by the fact that BUTT, J., has accepted the proposition in question without query. In the circumstances I may, perhaps, be permitted to consider shortly the purpose and effect of s. 18 of the Wills Act. The section provides that wills shall be revoked by subsequent marriage except in so far as they exercise powers of appointment where the instrument creating the power provides that in default of appointment the fund subject to the power does not pass to the heir at law or " next of kin under the Statute of Distributions." If these last words are ambiguous, and it seems to me that they may be, it is right that consideration should be given to the whole purposes of the section and such interpretation given to the potentially ambiguous words as shall carry out the intentions of the legislature if these can be ascertained. The event which the section contemplates is the re-marriage of a person who has made a will, and the circumstances in which a will so made shall be revoked by such subsequent marriage. If the instrument creating the power of appointment provides that, in default of appointment the fund shall pass to named persons or, as in the present case, that a widow shall be excluded from all share in the fund, this manifests an intention by the settlor and grantor of the power that the fund shall not in default of appointment pass as on an intestacy. If, on the other hand, the instrument creating the power provides in terms that in default of appointment the fund shall pass as on an intestacy, the settlor has not thereby manifested any intention actively to control the ultimate destination of the fund. It is the marriage of the testator which revokes his previously made will, so that if after marriage he dies without making another will his widow will take her portion on an intestacy under the Statute of Distributions. In so far as the exercise by will of powers of appointment are concerned, there would seem logically to be no reason why a will exercising such powers should not be revoked by marriage where in default of the exercise of the power the after-taken wife is entitled to her widow's portion. Where, however, the settlor under the instrument creating the power has provided that in default of appointment no wife of the appointee shall take any portion of the fund, it seems not unreasonable to adopt a construction of the words in the Act which will give effect to the wish of the settlor, and will preserve such portion of the will as exercises the power of appointment.

I have, accordingly, come to the conclusion that the meaning of the words in s. 18 of the Wills Act "next of kin under the Statute of Distributions" were intended to include a widow. The intention of the section was that a will exercising a power of appointment should only be wholly revoked by the subsequent marriage of the testator in those cases in which the instrument creating the power provides that in default of appointment the fund shall devolve as on an intestacy, in which event the widow of the testator will take her portion of the fund. This construction gives to the material words in s. 18 the meaning which has been assigned to them by Butt, J., in In the Goods of Russell (2). It is also the meaning which they necessarily have since 1925 in documents to which s. 50 (1) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, applies. I, accordingly, order a grant of administration to the applicant with that part of the will which remains unrevoked annexed.

R. v. KRITZ.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Stable, JJ.), July 13, 1949.]

Criminal Law—False pretences—Direction to jury—Intent to defraud—Onus of proof.

The appellant obtained a sum of £70,000 from a bank by drawing large sums against uncleared accommodation cheques which he knew to be worthless. He falsely represented to the manager that he was engaged in whisky transactions on a large scale and showed him cases of whisky. It was contended at the trial that the bank manager was "in the business from the start" with the appellant, and that two cheques mentioned in the indictment had actually been paid into a bank on which some worthless cheques had been drawn, and, therefore, there was no intent to defraud. In directing the jury on intent to defraud, the trial judge said: "If a false statement, false to the knowledge of the person making it, is made and by this means money is obtained . . . the fact that the man may, and undoubtedly would if he got the chance, repay the money is immaterial . . . It is immaterial what he intended to do with the money if he obtained it by means of pretences that are false, with intent to defraud." By that direction, it was argued, the question of intent to defraud was withdrawn from the jury. It was further contended for the appellant that the trial judge, in directing the jury on the onus of proof, did not use the phrase that they must be "satisfied beyond reasonable doubt."

Held: (i) the direction given by the trial judge on intent to defraud conformed with the direction given by Channell, J., in R. v. Carpenter (1911) (25 Cox, C.C. 618), which, in the opinion of the court, was the locus classicus on the point and should always be given to juries in cases of intent to defraud.

R. v. Pickup (1931) (22 Cr. App. Rep. 186), distinguished.

(ii) when directing a jury on the onus of proof resting on the prosecution, no particular form of wording need be used and any direction which has the effect of conveying to a jury what is their duty is sufficient.

(iii) the summing-up at the trial of the appellant being satisfactory and correct, the appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted before the Common Serjeant at the Central Criminal Court on a charge of obtaining money by false pretences, and was sentenced to four years' penal servitude. His appeal was now dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Leon for the appellant.

T. Christmas Humphreys and Bass for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The appellant was convicted before the learned Common Serjeant of fraud on the Midland Bank involving something like £70,000, although he protested that all the bank lost was about £52,000. The appellant, who, apparently, carried on the business of a bookmaker, wanted to conduct some other businesses or obtain finance for himself at the expense of the bank. He embarked on a series of transactions (in which there was nothing very novel except the skill with which he carried them out), commonly called—I use the slang expression because it is very well known—"kite-flying," that is to say, dealing with what are sometimes more forensically called accommodation cheques. He got hold of a number of people, all people of straw, who had small sums in a bank and cheque books. He persuaded them to write cheques for sums which, I suppose, in their wildest dreams they never expected to possess. He paid these worthless documents into the Midland Bank so that the bank might let him draw against them before they were cleared.

Drawing against uncleared cheques is one of the oldest forms of fraud. Generally, bank managers are too much on their guard to let it go on, but in this case, because of the specious lies which the appellant told to the bank manager and of the fact that the bank manager did not have that degree of suspicion which bank managers ought to have, the appellant managed to defraud the bank to a very considerable extent. The appellant represented to the bank manager that he was carrying on enormous deals in whisky. In fact, he was not doing so, but he said he would show the manager the whisky he was supposed to be dealing with and he showed him a lot of cases. He said that the manager was willing to allow him to obtain this large amount of money because he promised him (the manager) a case of whisky. For one case of whisky to cost £70,000 seems to me, even at present prices, to be very extravagant, but so the matter went on, and when finally it came to an end, the bank were the losers to the extent of something like £70,000.

We have had a discussion on the meaning of the words " intent to defraud " and cases on false pretences and other kindred offences, such as fraudulent conversion have been cited, because it was argued by counsel for the appellant that the question of the intent to defraud was withdrawn from the jury. The Common Serjeant directed the jury as follows:

> " . . . this is the ruling that I must give you in law. If a false statement, false to the knowledge of the person making it, is made, and by this means money or credit is obtained, and the person who gives that money or credit does so in reliance on the false statements that have been made—that is sufficient and you need not go any further. The fact that the man may, and, undoubtedly, would if he got the chance, repay the money is, to my mind, quite immaterial, if, in fact, it can be said in this case that he ever did repay the money, because we know of the net results of all this unfortunate business, and that the bank has lost something between—well, take the accused man's figure if you like, £58,000—between £58,000 and £80,000. It is immaterial what he intended to do with the money if he obtained it by means of pretences that are false, with intent to defraud. And to defraud, as I say, means by deceit to get other people to take a certain course of action that is harmful to them."

Before I deal further with that passage I ought to say that the point which was very much impressed on the court was this. The two cheques with which the substance of the indictment was concerned were obtained on a certain day. Those cheques, it was said, the appellant intended to pay, and did pay into another bank on which these worthless cheques were drawn so that there would be funds to meet them. It was said he paid in some other money as well. No doubt, that was good news for the bank, but it does not seem to have made much difference. It was an essential part of the snowball that he should pay in money from time to time because, if he had not done so, the bank would have stopped this course of business much earlier than they did. By meeting those cheques he was not paying back to the bank the money he had borrowed that day. He was simply paying money to enable those cheques to be cashed, so that they would go in reduction pro tanto of the whole overdraft. That was all that was done in this case. The appellant endeavoured to satisfy the jury that there was no intent to defraud mainly by saying that the bank manager was in the business from the beginning, and he knew all about it. The bank manager denied that, and there is no reason for saying that the jury did not accept his denial because the Common Serjeant told them that, if they thought the bank manager was in the business, to use a neutral expression, then, of course, there was no intent to defraud.

This court desires to lay down in the clearest possible terms that they approve of the direction given to the jury by CHANNELL, J., in R. v. Carpenter (1). This is the locus classicus on this point. It was a case that arose out of the failure of the Charing Cross Bank, and CHANNELL, J., told counsel appearing in the case what he was going to say and got their assent to the direction he was going to give. It is not unimportant to see that the learned counsel were Sir John Simon, S.-G., for the Crown and Sir Henry Dickens, K.C., afterwards Common Serjeant of the City of London, for the defendants. CHANNELL, J., said (22 Cox, C.C., p. 624) :

> " If the defendant made statements of fact which he knew to be untrue, and made them for the purpose of inducing persons to deposit with him > money which he knew they would not deposit but for their belief in the truth of his statements, and if he was intending to use the money so obtained for purposes different from those for which he knew the depositors understood from his statements that he intended to use it, then, gentlemen, we have the intent to defraud, although he may have intended to repay the money if he could, and although he may have honestly believed, and may even have had good reason to believe, that he would be able to repay it. You see it is the fraud in the mode of getting the money, because you may by fraud get hold of money, even if you mean to repay it, and thoroughly believe that you can repay it—you are still defrauding the depositor."

Now mark the next passage :

> " You are not defrauding him of the money if you eventually do repay it, but you are defrauding the man because you are giving him something altogether different from what he thinks he is getting, and you are getting his money by your false statement. In such a case as that the false statement would not be honestly made, and this question as to the intent to defraud substantially comes to this : whether or not the statements were honestly made."

That is a statement of the law by one of the most eminent judges before whom I ever had the good fortune to practise. It has been universally regarded by judges and by counsel as the locus classicus on the point. Those words were expressly repeated (25 Cox C.C. 160) to a jury by AVORY, J., in R. v. Parker and Bulteel (2) where AVORY, J., read to the jury the direction of CHANNELL, J., and told them that that was the law on the subject.

It is argued now that later cases are in conflict with that decision. Whatever rule of law may be laid down or whatever guidance given to a jury may be approved, there must always be exceptional cases in which the general rule may not be wholly applicable. It is impossible to lay down in a direction to a jury or in a judgment a rule which can be universally applied without regard to the particular facts of each case. That is illustrated in the case on which counsel for the appellant most relied—R. v. Pickup (3). That was a case in which the appellant had acquired a motor car under a hire-purchase agreement with the Ebor Trading Company. Under the agreement the car was to remain the property of the company until all the instalments had been paid. The appellant owed £50 for arrears on instalments and a further sum of £70 was due for future instalments when he sold the car to a Mr. Nutter for £150 plus another motor car. It was found that after he had received the £150 and before he received the car from Mr. Nutter, the appellant paid off all arrears due to the Ebor Trading Company and later paid other sums in discharge of his debt to them, and before the police court hearing Mr. Nutter agreed to accept certain property of the appellant in discharge of the liabilities which had been transferred to him by the Ebor Trading Company.

In that case the learned recorder told the jury that, as the appellant had said the car was his, there was an end of the case, and they need not consider anything else. That shows what I have already said, that there may often be cases which on their particular facts cannot be brought within the general principles laid down by the judges from time to time on some particular matter. Pickup was probably an honest man. Many people may honestly think when they have a car on hire-purchase on which they have paid a number of nstalments : " This is my car, and I will sell it to you." That is the sort of question to be left to the jury : Was the man honest ? It is really an application of what CHANNELL, J., said in the direction I have read, namely, that n such a case as that with which he was dealing the false statement would not be honestly made, and the " question as to the intent to defraud substantially comes to this : whether or not the statements were honestly made ? " The court quashed the conviction in Pickup's (3) case because the recorder had withdrawn from the jury any chance of their saying that the statements were honestly made in the circumstances of the case. How could that question possibly have been left to the jury in the present case ? The appellant's defence was that the bank manager was " in this all the time." It is true he said : " I had no intent to defraud," and bolstered that up by adding : " I was going to pay the money to the bank." That was not the point. The point was that this was not an isolated transaction as there was in Pickup's case (3) or Hunt's case (4), which depended on the dialogue which took place between the learned judge and the foreman of the jury when the charge was given. This was one of a series of transactions all of which had one common object, to defraud the bank.

Therefore, in our opinion, there is nothing in the argument that the Common Serjeant did not leave the question of intent to defraud properly to the jury. In our view, he did not give any wrong direction. This court has not the least intention of departing from the classical direction on this question, namely, that in R. v. Carpenter (1). We say that in order that there may be no further doubt in anybody's mind as to what is the law with regard to intent to defraud or the direction which should be given to the jury.

The only other point seriously argued is this. It is argued that because the Common Serjeant told the jury that they must be reasonably satisfied, and did not use the words " satisfied beyond reasonable doubt " he was not stating sufficiently on which side lay the onus of proof. It would be a great misfortune, in criminal cases especially, if the accuracy or not of a summing-up was to depend on whether or not the judge or the chairman had used a particular formula of words. It is not the particular formula of words that matter. It is the effect of the summing-up. If the jury are made to understand whether in one set of words or in another, that they must not return a verdict against a defendant unless they feel sure of his guilt and that the onus all the time is on the prosecution and not on the defence, then, whether the judge uses one form of language or whether he uses another is neither here nor there.

In our opinion, there was a perfectly fair and proper summing-up by the Common Serjeant in this case. We do not think any jury could have been left in doubt as to what was their duty. Juries are not such fools as they are often thought to be. They know when they get into the jury box and certainly after they have been there a short time that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the case and that they have to be fully and thoroughly satisfied of the prisoner's guilt before they can convict him. Juries very seldom want guidance on that point, but it is right that they should have it. It is right that they should be reminded that the onus is on the prosecution all the way through the case. It is right that they should be reminded that they must be fully satisfied of the guilt of the accused and should not find a verdict against him unless they feel sure. That is the direction which I myself constantly give to juries when I am at assizes. By using the words " reasonable doubt " and trying to explain what is a reasonable doubt and what is not, judges are more likely to confuse juries than if they told them in plain language : " It is the duty of the prosecution to satisfy you of the man's guilt." I am not saying that the learned Common Serjeant used that formula of words nor am I saying that it is to be preferred before all others, but what I am saying—and I am sure I say it with the full assent of my brethren—is that it is not the actual formula which is used which is vital. It is the effect of the summing-up which is important, and, if the effect of the summing-up is to convey to the jury what is their duty, that is enough. We do not find that anything substantial which could really have affected the minds of the jury was omitted from this summing-up. For these reasons, in the opinion of the court, this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

After the judgment LORD GODDARD, C.J., said that the court was inclined to make an order against the appellant for the expense to the country of transcribing the shorthand note of the trial. Being informed by counsel that the appellant was bankrupt and undischarged and that in consequence any order to pay costs could only be recovered as a preferential debt, his lordship said in that circumstance no order would be made.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 18, 1949.]

Alimony—Undertaking before decree nisi to pay wife "£3 per week alimony as from the date of the decree nisi"—Effect of undertaking.

On Nov. 15, 1945, a husband and a wife entered into a separation agreement in the usual form under which the husband undertook to pay to the wife an allowance of £2 10*s*. per week during their joint lives, provided that if, with mutual consent, they should cohabit as man and wife for a continuous period of not less than three months the allowance and all provisions of the agreement should determine. On Feb. 11, 1947, the wife filed a petition for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's adultery and claiming alimony pendente lite. On Mar. 27, 1947, the husband visited the wife's solicitor and signed a document of that date which provided: "I . . . hereby agree and undertake to pay to my wife Muriel Nellie Storr the sum of £3 per week alimony as from the date of the decree nisi being pronounced." On Aug. 8, 1947, a decree nisi was pronounced, and on Oct. 25, 1947, it was made absolute. The husband paid the wife £2 10*s*. per week until the pronouncement of the decree nisi, and thereafter until September, 1948, he paid her £3 per week. In September, 1948, the wife re-married, and the husband made her no further payments. The wife now claimed under the document of Mar. 27, 1947, arrears of the payments of £3 per week since Oct. 1, 1948.

HELD: (i) the existence of the document of Mar. 27, 1947, did not preclude the wife from claiming alimony pendente lite after the petition had been filed or permanent maintenance after the decree was made absolute, and, as the giving up of her claims to alimony and maintenance was the only possible consideration for the husband's undertaking, the document was a nudum pactum and not enforceable.

Hyman v. Hyman ([1929] A.C. 601), applied.

(ii) as the word "alimony" was never applied to payments made after the decree absolute, on its proper construction the document covered only payments after the decree nisi up to the date of the decree absolute.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of His Honour JUDGE DONE, at Watford County Court, dated Feb. 23, 1949.

The county court judge held that a written undertaking by a husband to pay his wife " the sum of £3 per week alimony as from the date of the decree nisi being pronounced " was binding after the wife's re-marriage. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal, holding that the undertaking was unsupported by consideration, and that, as the term " alimony " was only appropriate when applied to payments made between the date of the decree nisi and that of the decree absolute, the undertaking would not in any case extend beyond the latter date. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

M. Hoare for the husband.

N. King for the wife.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : The plaintiff is the wife of Erwin von Gaisberg, and she claimed in the county court a sum of money from her former husband, George Leonard Storr, under a document which is described in the particulars of claim as an agreement in writing. The document is written on the note-paper of Nelson L. Mitchell, solicitor, 50, Alexandra Street, Southend-on-Sea, is dated Mar. 27, 1947, and is in the following terms :

> " Storr v. Storr. I, George Leonard Storr, 63, Tintern Avenue, Westcliff-on-Sea, in the county of Essex, hereby agree and undertake to pay to my wife Muriel Nellie Storr the sum of £3 per week alimony as from the date of the decree nisi being pronounced in these proceedings. Dated the 27th March, 1947."

The claim goes on to allege facts which are not in dispute, namely, that the decree nisi was pronounced on Aug. 8, 1947, and that the defendant failed to pay alimony after Oct. 1, 1948. It is in respect of that failure to pay that the claim is made. The answer in the defence was that this alimony was only legally payable to the date of the decree absolute, and any payment after that date was a voluntary one.

The parties were married in July, 1925. There is one child of the marriage, born in 1930. On Nov. 15, 1945, the parties entered into a separation agreement. It was in the usual form, setting out that " unhappy differences have arisen between the spouses by reason whereof they have agreed to live separate and apart from each other "; and it goes on to state that " the husband has agreed to pay such allowance to the wife as hereinafter appears in manner and for the purposes and subject to the conditions hereinafter provided." In the body of the agreement the husband agrees with the wife that she may live free from his control and authority as if she were unmarried, that during the joint lives of the spouses he will pay to her £2 10*s*. 0*d*. per week, that he will not molest, annoy, disturb or interfere with her in her business or manner of life, and that he will have the custody of the child. At the end there is this provision:

> " Provided always and it is hereby agreed between and by the spouses that if they shall with their mutual consent again cohabit as man and wife for the continuous period of not less than three months the allowance shall thereupon determine and cease to be payable and all agreements and provisions hereinbefore contained shall become void."

It seems to me that that agreement was clearly intended to deal only with the state of things which existed so long as the husband and wife remained married and was not intended in any way to deal with the situation which would arise if a divorce came about.

The husband regularly paid the allowance under the deed, and on Feb. 11, 1947, the wife filed a petition for dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery and also for alimony pendente lite and costs. It appears that the husband, who did not file an answer to the petition, had an interview with the clerk of the solicitor acting for the wife and he signed the document of Mar. 27, 1947, which I have read. Up to the date of the decree nisi, Aug. 8, 1947, the husband continued his payments of £2 10*s.* 0*d.* a week. On Oct. 25, 1947, the decree was made absolute. After the date of the decree nisi the husband paid £3 a week until the end of September, 1948, when the wife re-married. He then ceased all further payments.

The only witness called in the county court was the wife. She produced the agreement, proved the payments to which I have referred, and then said:

> "I took no steps to get a court order for maintenance. I took it for granted the solicitor was looking after my interests and I left everything to him. The agreement dated Mar. 27, 1947, was in my possession. Defendant was assistant welfare officer employed by borough of Southend 25 years."

In cross-examination she said :

> "The agreement was sent to me by my solicitors. I was expecting it. I gave no undertaking in return for it and did nothing in return for it. I regarded it as permanently regulating the position. I did not understand about alimony proceedings. I did not really bother my head about the question. I did not know how defendant interpreted the agreement. I was living at Southend. Mitchell was my solicitor. I saw him about the divorce, i.e., instructed him to issue petition. No answer filed. I was expecting agreement because I had consulted solicitor as to finance. I asked how I stood because I did not want to be left high and dry and did not know much about it."

Counsel for the husband called no evidence, and then the learned county court judge gave judgment for the wife. I need not read his judgment except the essential part in which he is dealing with the construction of the document. He says:

> "The effect of the document is that the wife by her solicitor agreed with her husband that the question of her support should be settled between themselves without further resort to the court, and the wife's rights and husband's obligations as to maintenance were settled between them. It may be that the wife was giving up something—that is uncertain —but she did agree to accept £3 and that was the consideration. I think there is no ambiguity, but, if there is, I should hold, from the fact that the wife accepted payments at the rate provided by the document and the husband paid them from decree nisi and continued after decree absolute, and that it was not until ten months later that he stopped them and then, not on the ground that the agreement was to apply only up to decree absolute, but on the irrelevant ground that the wife had re-married, that the same construction must apply. The husband's acts support the view that the agreement was to pay for their joint lives."

In my view, there was no legal consideration for this so-called agreement. It is quite clear from the decision of the House of Lords in Hyman v. Hyman (1) that:

> "A wife who covenants by a deed of separation not to take proceedings against her husband to allow her alimony or maintenance beyond the provision made for her by the deed, and thereafter obtains a decree for > dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery, is not precluded by her covenant from petitioning the court for permanent maintenance."

Lord Hailsham, L.C., said ([1929] A.C. 608):

> "In 1857 the legislature for the first time gave to the courts the power to dissolve the marriage tie by a decree of divorce. Such a decree does A not merely affect the relationship of the husband and the wife one to another, but it also changes the status of each of them . . . Such a provision is not made solely in the interests of the wife, but also in the interests of third parties who may deal with the wife or who may, as in the case of Poor Law Guardians, become responsible for her sustenance. If this be the proper inference from the language of the statute, I am prepared to hold B that the parties cannot validly make an agreement either (1) not to invoke the jurisdiction of the court, or (2) to control the powers of the court when its jurisdiction is invoked."

That being the law, it seems to me that this document which was signed by the husband did not in any way preclude the wife from claiming alimony at any time after the petition had been filed or from claiming maintenance after C the decree absolute was made. If it did not so preclude her, I cannot see what consideration there can be for the undertaking of the husband. I think it was merely a statement by the husband of what he intended to do after the decree nisi had been granted. He intended to pay the £2 10*s*. 0*d*. a week until the decree nisi was made, and after that he intended to pay £3 a week. That being so, I think that the document of Mar. 27, 1947, was really a nudum pactum D and is not enforceable at law.

There is a second ground on which also, I think, the claim fails. The agreement as it stands—if it is an agreement—is merely to pay alimony as from the date of the decree nisi. Alimony is a word which is never used in the Divorce Division to cover payments by a husband to the wife after the decree absolute. It may be used as "permanent alimony" where the marriage tie subsists and E there is merely a decree of judicial separation, or it may be used as "alimony pending suit," which covers the period from the filing of the petition until the grant of the decree absolute. If one reads this document strictly, it seems to me to cover only that period of time which would elapse from the decree nisi to the decree absolute. How long that would be nobody could tell. There might be an intervention by the King's Proctor or a failure by the wife to ask F for a decree absolute until her costs had been paid. Many slips may arise between decree nisi and decree absolute. It seems to me that that is what the document means and nothing more. It is said, however, that it must mean something more than that because there must have been an intention to deal with the period after the decree absolute. That may be, but, if one is to interpret this document in the light of reason and common-sense, it seems to me impossible G to suppose that the husband ever intended to bind himself to pay £3 a week to his wife if she married again, perhaps to a man who was far more able to support her than he himself. She might marry two or three times, but, according to the construction which the wife would put on this document, the husband would have to continue paying her £3 a week. I do not know whether it is suggested that the contract is to bind his executors and to make them liable to pay £3 H a week until the wife dies or whether it is suggested that it ends with his death. It is rather significant, I think, that while the separation agreement did deal with the phrase "joint lives," no such phrase appears in this document of Mar. 27, 1947. I think, therefore, that, reading the document in a reasonable way, even if there is a contract there, it cannot be said to bind the husband to pay this sum after the wife had married again. For both these reasons, in my judgment, the appeal should be allowed.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion and I only desire to add a few observations on one point. The learned county court judge relied on the decision in Watcham v. A.-G. of East Africa Protectorate (2), where LORD ATKINSON, in giving the reasons of the Privy Council, said ([1919] A.C. 540), referring to cases he had cited:

> "These cases, their Lordships think, establish the principle that even in the case of a modern instrument in which there is a latent ambiguity, evidence may be given of user under it to show the sense in which the parties to it used the language they have employed, and their intention in executing the instrument as revealed by their language interpreted in this sense."

The learned judge in the present case came to the conclusion that the defendant's acts supported the view that the defendant was to pay alimony for the joint lives of himself and his wife. In my view, the Watcham case (2) requires to be applied with care, and certainly before it can be applied in such a case as the present it must be shown (i) that there is an agreement, and (ii) that the acts which are relied on unequivocally support the construction which the court is invited by counsel relying on them to adopt. In the present case it is by no means clear that there is an agreement. I need not go further into that point. Suffice to say that I agree with the observations on it made by BUCKNILL, L.J. In the second place, even if there was an agreement, the acts relied on are as consistent with the agreement coming to an end on the re-marriage of the wife as with its continuing during the joint lives of the husband and the wife. In those circumstances the Watcham case (2) does not appear to me to support the conclusion which the learned county court judge reached. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: Counsel for the wife, in the course of an ingenious argument, has described the document as clear, simple, unambiguous and intelligible. With great respect, I cannot agree. The document specifies the date on which the payments are to begin, but not for how long they shall continue or in what event, if any, they should cease. The husband agrees to pay the money, but it is doubtful whether he agrees to do so only so long as the wife remains his wife or longer. He agrees to pay, leaving it uncertain whether this means something corresponding to alimony pendente lite, or something corresponding to permanent maintenance, or, as seems probable, something corresponding to neither. That is neither clear nor simple, but it is clear that nowhere on the face of this document is any consideration specified or even indicated by implication. The evidence, moreover, given by the wife, who was the only witness called, was to the effect that she undertook nothing and did nothing in return for this letter. The only consideration which can be deduced by inference from the circumstances would be an undertaking by the wife, in exchange for the husband's undertaking, not to apply to the court for alimony pendente lite or permanent maintenance, but any promise given by her to refrain from so applying would have been void and unenforceable on the principle laid down in Hyman v. Hyman (1). In those circumstances I think that there is no evidence of any consideration moving from the wife to the husband and that the agreement in the document is not a binding contract. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs in both courts.

Street Traffic—Mechanically-propelled vehicle—Licence—Limited trade licence—Tractor towing loaded trailer—Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations, 1941 (S.R. & O., 1941, No. 1149), reg. 30, art. B (1), provisos (b), (i).

By the Roads Act, 1920, s. 9 (1), manufacturers of and dealers in mechanically-propelled vehicles were enabled, subject to certain conditions, to take out a general licence in respect of vehicles used by them in lieu of separate licences for each such vehicle. By the Finance Act, 1922, s. 15 (2), the Minister of Transport was empowered to make two sets of regulations under s. 9 of the Roads Act, 1920, and para. (a) of the subsection provided that the annual rate of duty in the case of a limited trade licence was to be £5 as compared with £25 for a general trade licence. By proviso (b) to reg. 30, art. B (1), of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations, 1941 (made under the Acts of 1920 and 1922): "No vehicle which is being used upon a public road under a limited trade licence shall carry or convey any goods or load whatsoever except such load as it may be necessary to carry for the purpose of testing the vehicle. Any such load shall consist solely of some ordinary form of ballast such as sand gravel scrap iron or the like . . ." By proviso (i) at the end of reg. 30, art. B (1), it was provided that "for the duration of the present war it shall not be an infringement of this regulation for a new vehicle used under a limited trade licence in the course of its delivery to a purchaser or to a port for export to carry any load so long as that load is not carried for hire or reward."

On Oct. 25, 1948, the appellants, who were the holders of a limited trade licence, used a motor tractor to draw through the streets a trailer on which another trailer was loaded. Both the trailers were new and were to be delivered at the docks for export, but the motor tractor was not new. The appellants were charged with an offence against proviso (b) to reg. 30, art. B (1), of the regulations of 1941, in that they "did carry goods not being the ordinary form of ballast for a purpose other than that of testing the vehicle." It was contended by the appellants (a) that the trailer should be regarded as part of the vehicle; (b) that no goods had been "carried" by the tractor; and (c) that proviso (i) to reg. 30, art. B (1), applied in that the trailers were in course of delivery to a port for export.

HELD: (i) it was the tractor only, and not the trailer, that was licensed, and the trailer could not be regarded as part of the vehicle, and, therefore, as the tractor was being used under a limited trade licence to carry goods, it was being used in breach of proviso (b) to reg. 30, art. B (1).

(ii) the words "convey" and "carry" in reg. 30 were interchangeable, and, therefore, it was immaterial that the word "carry," and not the word "convey," had been used in the information.

(iii) assuming that the country was still in a state of war, proviso (i) to reg. 30, art. B (1), did not apply because the tractor was not a new vehicle.

[FOR THE ROAD VEHICLES (REGISTRATION AND LICENSING) REGULATIONS, 1941, reg. 30, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 34, pp. 417-419.]

CASE STATED by a metropolitan police magistrate.

An information was preferred at Old Street Magistrate's Court, London, against the appellants charging them with an offence against the Roads Act, 1920, and the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations, 1941, in that, on Oct. 25, 1948, being the holders of a limited trade licence, they used a motor tractor on a public road under that licence and failed to observe proviso (b) to reg. 30, art. B (1), of the regulations, in that they "did carry goods . . . for a purpose other than that of testing the said vehicle." The appellants, who were the owners of the motor tractor, had used it to tow a new trailer on which was loaded another new trailer, both of the trailers being intended for delivery at the docks for export. The appellants contended that no offence had been committed because (a) the facts did not disclose that any goods whatever had been carried by the tractor; (b) if the facts amounted to the carrying of any goods, the trailers were in the course of delivery to a port for export within proviso (i) to reg. 30, art. B (1). The magistrate, who heard the information on Jan. 3 and 11, 1949, held that the facts amounted to a carrying of one or both of the trailers and that proviso (i) to reg. 30, art. B (1), had no application to the facts of the case, and he, therefore, held that the offence had been proved. The appeal from his decision was now dismissed by the Divisional Court.

Charles Lawson for the appellants.
Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate before whom the appellants were charged under the Roads Act, 1920, and the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations, 1941, in that they

> " . . . being the holders of a limited trade licence did use a vehicle, viz., a motor tractor, on a public road under that licence and did fail to observe and fulfil proviso (b) contained in reg. 30, art. B (1), of the said regulations, viz., did carry goods not being the ordinary form of ballast for a purpose other than that of testing the vehicle, contrary to reg. 30, art. B (2), of the said regulations."

The magistrate convicted the appellants, and imposed a fine of £10. The facts show that on Oct. 25, 1948, a mechanically-propelled vehicle of the class that is known as a tractor was towing through the streets a trailer. The trailer was not superimposed on the tractor. The trailer, which was new, was loaded with another new trailer, and we are told that both trailers were intended for shipment. The magistrate held that the fact that the tractor was towing these trailers amounted to an offence.

By the Roads Act, 1920, s. 9, provision was made as to the licence duty which was chargeable in the case of manufacturers of or dealers in mechanically-propelled vehicles, and the appellants come within that description. The section provides that, in lieu of taking out a licence in respect of each vehicle kept by him, a manufacturer or dealer may take out a general licence in respect of all vehicles used by him, subject to certain conditions. That section was amended by the Finance Act, 1922, and s. 15 (2) provides:

> "It shall be lawful for the Minister of Transport to make two sets of regulations under the said s. 9 prescribing the conditions subject to which general licences are to be issued and prescribing the purposes for which the holder of a general licence may use it . . ."

Section 15 (2) (a) and (b) provide that, where one set of regulations applies, the yearly rate of duty is £25, and, where the other set of regulations applies, i.e., for a limited trade licence, it is only £5. It is, therefore, obvious that the legislature intended the holder of a limited trade licence to be pretty severely circumscribed. He was not to act as a haulier or transporter because he was only paying a duty of £5. The Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations, 1941, were made by the Minister of Transport under inter alia the Roads Act, 1920, and the Finance Act, 1922, s. 15, and reg. 30 provides that the regulations which follow shall apply to limited trade licences. There follows a variety of provisions stating what the holder of a limited trade licence may do, and proviso (b) to reg. 30, art. B (1), is :

> " No vehicle which is being used upon a public road under a limited trade licence shall carry or convey any goods or load whatsoever except such load as it may be necessary to carry for the purpose of testing the vehicle."

The proviso then sets out the articles that may be put into the vehicle in the form of ballast. By reg. 30, art. B (2) :

> " No vehicle shall be used upon a public road under a limited trade licence for any purpose other than a purpose for which the vehicle is authorised by para. (1) of this article to be used under such licence."

With all respect to the argument of counsel for the appellants, it seems to me clear that what is licensed in the present case is not the trailer but the tractor. It is the mechanical horse, as it is sometimes called, that is licensed, and, if that licensed vehicle is being used under a limited trade licence, it must not carry or convey any goods or load " except such load as it may be necessary to carry for the purpose of testing the vehicle." The vehicle in this case was being used to carry a loaded trailer, i.e., a trailer which was loaded with goods, viz., another trailer, which was being taken to the docks for the purpose of shipment. It seems to me impossible to say that the load which the vehicle was carrying was necessary for the purpose of testing the vehicle, and, indeed, it is not argued that it was. What is said, as I understand it, is that the trailer must be regarded as part of the vehicle. Why the two trailers must be regarded as part of the vehicle I do not know, but I am clearly of opinion that this vehicle was being used in breach of proviso (b) to reg. 30, art. B (1). Whether the words used in the information should have been " convey " rather than " carry " I do not think is a matter with which we need take up any time. I think it is clear from the wording of the regulation as a whole that the words " convey " or " carry ", as used therein, are interchangeable.

There is only one other point I need mention. At the end of reg. 30, art. B (1), there is a proviso:

> " Provided further that for the duration of the present war it shall not be an infringement of this regulation (i) for a new vehicle used under a limited trade licence in the course of its delivery to a purchaser or to a port for export to carry any load so long as that load is not carried for hire or reward . . . "

Assuming that the country is still in a state of war with some of the belligerents, because no definitive peace treaty as yet been made with Germany, this proviso, as the magistrate found, does not apply in this case, because the tractor was not a new vehicle. It is obvious that this proviso means that, if a new vehicle is being driven to the docks for export, it may have some goods in it. In my opinion, the magistrate was right, and this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Re VISCOUNT GALWAY'S WILL TRUSTS. LOWTHER v. VISCOUNT GALWAY AND OTHERS.

[Chancery Division (Harman, J.) June 24, 27, July 13, 1949.]

Ademption—Devise of land "including mines and minerals thereunder"—Vesting of coal and coal mines in Coal Commission—Re-publication—Confirmation of devise by codicil—Inclusion in gift of compensation moneys.

By his will dated June 24, 1922, a testator devised and bequeathed his residuary estate on trusts which he revoked by a codicil dated Nov. 2, 1927. By that codicil the testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees (a) as to his unsettled estate in Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire including the mines and minerals thereunder, subject to an annuity, for his eldest son for life with remainders in tail and remainders over, under which the testator's widow and daughters were, or might be, interested, (b) as to his N.M. Colliery shares on certain trusts, and (c) as to his residuary personal estate to his said eldest son on his attaining 21. A second codicil, which was undated, revoked an annuity given by the first codicil, but in other respects confirmed the will and first codicil. On Aug. 16, 1941, the testator made a third codicil, revoking a specific bequest and replacing it by another, but otherwise confirming his will as varied by his first two codicils which he also confirmed. Under the Coal Act, 1938, all coal and mines of coal were held during the period from Jan. 1, 1939, to July 1, 1942, as if all the existing owners thereof had entered into a contract on Jan. 1, 1939, for the sale of the coal to the Coal Commission at a price to be ascertained by valuation, and on July 1, 1942, by s. 3 (3) all coal and mines of coal vested in the commission. On Mar. 27, 1943, the testator died possessed of extensive freehold estates in Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire under which were large coal deposits.

Held: as at the date of his death the testator owned no coal or coal mines but only an interest in compensation not then assessed, the gift of mines and minerals, so far as it related thereto, was adeemed, and re-publication of the will by the codicil dated Aug. 16, 1941, did not cause the gift to include the compensation moneys payable in respect of the appropriation of the coal and coal mines.

Adjourned Summons to determine whether on the true construction of the first and third codicils to the testator's will the compensation to which the testator was entitled under the Coal Act, 1938, was included in the gift in the first codicil of " all my unsettled estates in Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire including the mines and minerals thereunder " or in the gift in the same codicil of the testator's residuary personal estate. HARMAN, J., held that it passed under the latter gift. The facts appear in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

Wilfrid M. Hunt for the plaintiff, the executor and one of the Settled Land Act trustees.

R. W. Goff for the first defendant, the testator's only son.

Methven for the remaining defendants, the testator's daughters and widow (who were, or might be, interested in remainder in the devise of the testator's estate in Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire) and for the second Settled Land Act trustee.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. The late Viscount Galway, the testator in this case, by his will of June 24, 1922, appointed his brother-in-law (who predeceased him) and the plaintiff to be executors and trustees both for general and Settled Land Act purposes, and by cl. 7 devised and bequeathed his residue in terms which he revoked by cl. 3 of his first codicil. By the said cl. 3 of this latter instrument, which was dated Nov. 2, 1927, the testator gave, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to his trustees on the following trusts: (a) " as to all my unsettled estate in Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire including the mines and minerals thereunder subject to an annuity " to the use of his eldest son, the first defendant, for life with remainders in tail and divers remainders over under which the second, third, fourth and fifth defendants are or may be interested, (b) " as to my New Monckton Colliery shares " as there mentioned, (c) " as to all the remainder of my personal estate not hereby otherwise disposed of " for the first defendant absolutely contingently on his attaining 21 years with remainders over if he failed to attain that age. The testator made a second codicil which was undated and which, after reciting cl. 3 of the first codicil, revoked an annuity thereby given and in other respects confirmed the will and first codicil. He made a third codicil on Aug. 16, 1941, revoking a specific bequest to his wife and substituting another specific bequest, and, subject as aforesaid, he confirmed his will except so far as revoked or varied by his first and second codicils which he thereby confirmed.

The testator died on Mar. 27, 1943, and his will was proved by the plaintiff on Nov. 5, 1943. The plaintiff remains its sole trustee for general purposes, but he has appointed the last defendant to act with him as Settled Land Act trustee. The first defendant is the testator's only son and is an infant, and the second, third and fourth defendants are the testator's daughters. The fifth defendant is his widow. The testator was absolutely entitled to extensive freehold estates in the counties of Nottingham and York settled by his will, and these included large amounts of coal under the surface. The testator's rights in this coal were entirely altered by the Coal Act, 1938. By s. 3 (1) of that Act the Coal Commission constituted under the Act was directed to acquire the fee simple in all coal and mines of coal which were directed by s. 3 (2) to be held during the period between Jan. 1, 1939 (the valuation date), and July 1, 1942 (the vesting date) as if all the existing owners had entered into a contract on the valuation date for the sale of the coal to the commission at a price to be ascertained by valuation with provisions for completion of the contract on the vesting date. By s. 3 (3) on the vesting date all coal and mines of coal as existing at that date were to vest in the commission for a title comprising all interests then subsisting in any such coal or mine other than retained interests, with which I am not here concerned. By s. 6 (1) the commission was directed to pay as compensation to existing owners for the acquisition of their interests sums ascertained as the Act provides in respect of all coal and mines of coal directed to vest in the commission. Section 6 (3) shows the aggregate amount payable for the whole of Great Britain, and s. 6 (4) divides this into regions. Section 7 of the Act provides how compensation is to be ascertained and how between the several regions it is to be distributed.

It results from the foregoing review of the Act that on Jan. 1, 1939, the testator was put into the position of a man who had contracted to sell the whole of his coal interests to the Coal Commission at a price to be ascertained by valuation, and that on July 1, 1942, that contract was to be deemed completed, and the legal interest of the testator in the coal vested in the commission as the equitable interest had done at the valuation date. It seems, therefore, that when he died in March, 1943, the testator had no interest in the coal under his properties. His only interest was in the compensation not then yet assessed. This was, in fact, fixed in or about the month of March, 1944, and received somewhat later, and, after payment of certain encumbrances, there remains in the hands of the plaintiff a sum of about £46,000 of compensation money. The question in this case is whether the devise in strict settlement contained in cl. 3 of the first codicil of the testator's estate including the mines and minerals thereunder operates on this compensation money, or whether the devise was adeemed by the events which happened and the compensation money passes under the testator's residuary bequest. At first sight the answer looks plain enough. The testator at the date of his death, from which for this purpose his will speaks, had no coal nor mines of coal nor minerals, and there is a clear case of ademption. It is, however, suggested on behalf of the testator's widow and daughters that by re-publishing his will by a codicil dated after the valuation the testator must be held to have intended that the compensation money should pass under the devise of mines and minerals and to have sufficiently expressed that intention. I cannot accept this contention. It is old law, at least as old as the days of LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., that a re-publication cannot operate to make good a legacy once adeemed: see the judgment in Drinkwater v. Falconer (1) (2 Ves. Sen. 626) and also the decision of LORD COTTENHAM, L.C., in Powys v. Mansfield (2) (3 My. & Cr. 375, 376). The cases, indeed, show that even a contract to sell will work an ademption: see the decision of SIR CHARLES HALL, V.-C., in Watts v. Watts (3). Much more so, therefore, will a contract which has been brought to completion as this one was in the testator's lifetime. It is said, however, that there is a modern line of authority which prevents me coming to this conclusion, and my attention was drawn to a number of cases connected with the subject of the conversion into personal property by the Law of Property Act, 1925, of an undivided share in real estate. The earlier cases, and, in particular, the decision of CLAUSON, J., in Re Price (4), seem to have accepted the conversion worked by the Act of 1925 at its full value, but it seems to me that this was seen to defeat the intention of testators, and the more recent cases, in particular Re Warren (5) and Re Harvey (6), have emphasised the fact that the owner of an undivided share in real estate still has an interest in the real estate under the statutory trusts for sale, which are after all only a conveyancing device for avoiding the complication of partition actions, and it has, therefore, been held that a confirmatory codicil after 1926 may save from ademption by the legislation of 1925 an undivided share in real property. Those cases seem to me to have very little to do with the present. Here there was no conveyancing device leaving a man substantially in the same position as before, but a real statutory disappropriation of the proprietor in favour of the State, subject to the payment of statutory compensation. I ought, perhaps, to add that a question akin to this appears to have been decided by EVERSHED, J., in Re Hatfield (7). In the upshot, I hold that, on the true construction of the testator's will and codicil, the compensation to which the testator was entitled at his death under the Coal Act passed under the gift of the testator's residuary personal estate.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 20, 21, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Premises let with dwelling-house—House let on Sept. 1, 1939*—Subsequent letting of house and separate garage—Treatment of garage as part of dwelling-house—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act*, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (3).

On Sept. 1, 1939, a flat, which came within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, was let at a rent of £135 per annum, the landlord paying rates, and a garage in the vicinity of the flat, but not contiguous thereto, was let to a different tenant at 5*s*. a week. In 1946 the flat and the garage were let by a single lease to a tenant at a rent of £175 per annum, the tenant paying rates, and the lease provided that the premises let were entire and indivisible. In proceedings to determine the standard rent of the premises,

HELD: under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (3), the garage fell to be treated as part of the dwelling-house, and, accordingly, the standard rent of the dwelling-house comprising the flat and the garage was £135 per annum, the rent at which the flat alone was let on Sept. 1, 1939.

APPEAL by the landlords from a decision of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., sitting at Croydon County Court, on Mar. 4, 1949, whereby he determined the standard rent of premises comprising flat No. 2, The Woodlands, Upper Norwood, and garage No. 7 thereat to be the rent at which the flat alone was let on Sept. 1, 1939. The Court of Appeal dismissed the landlords' appeal.

Beney, K.C., and Heathcote-Williams, K.C., for the landlords.

Lloyd-Jones, K.C., and Vester for the tenant.

COHEN, L.J.: The question in this case concerns the standard rent of premises at The Woodlands, Beulah Hill, Upper Norwood, which are admitted to be within the protection of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts by virtue of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. The premises consist of Flat No. 2 on the ground floor of The Woodlands and garage No. 7, the garage being in the vicinity of, but not contiguous to, the flat and there being no track, so to speak, from the one to the other. This is a test case. There are five other flats similarly let with garages, and appeals in the five cases relating to those flats are pending the decision of this appeal.

On Sept. 1, 1939—which is the material date in considering the effect of the Act of 1939—the flat and the garage were let separately. The flat was let to one Price at a rent of £135 per annum, the landlords paying the rates, and the garage was let at 5*s.* a week to a Mrs. Crutch. Mrs. Crutch gave up the garage in October, 1939, and the flat fell into the possession of the landlords at the conclusion of the three years' tenancy to Mr. Price. On Jan. 16, 1946, a lease of the flat with the garage was granted to the tenant, Wing-Commander Batten, for a term of three years commencing from Feb. 1, 1946, the rent being fixed for the first two years at £175 per annum and for the third year at £185 per annum, the tenant in each case paying the rates. The lease to the tenant contained cl. 13 in the following terms:

> "It is hereby mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said premises are entire and indivisible and in the event of the tenancy hereby created being continued after the expiration of the term or of the tenant remaining in possession by virtue of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts or other statutory power any such extension shall be on the terms and condition that the said premises are entire and indivisible."

There can be no doubt that this clause was a device, but not a device which connotes anything illegal or immoral, and the question is whether the device has justified the end to which it was directed. In due course the tenant began these proceedings with a view to determining the standard rent of the premises comprised in the lease to him. On his behalf it was contended that under s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 the garage was to be deemed part of the dwelling-house consisting of the flat which had been let to Mr. Price on Sept. 1, 1939, and that, accordingly, the standard rent was £135 per annum. The landlord contended that there was a new letting of a new dwelling-house consisting of the flat plus the garage on Feb. 1, 1946; that this was the first letting of that dwelling-house; and that, accordingly, the standard rent was £185 per annum. The learned judge decided the point in favour of the tenant.

Before referring to the reasons which he gave for his conclusion, it would be convenient to consider s. 3 of the Act of 1939. Sub-section (1) provides:

> "Without prejudice to the operation of the two preceding sections in relation to any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied immediately before the commencement of this Act, the principal Acts . . . shall, subject to the provisions of this section, apply to every other dwelling-house of which the rateable value on the appropriate day did not exceed—(a) in the metropolitan police district or the city of London, £100 . . . and in relation to any such dwelling-house as aforesaid, not being a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts applied immediately before the commencement of this Act, the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1933, set out in the first column of sched. I to this Act shall have effect as if there were made in those provisions the modifications respectively prescribed by that schedule."

It is to be observed that the provisions of the earlier Acts remained in force as regards any dwelling-house which was subject to the Acts before the coming into force of the 1939 Act, but that certain of the provisions were modified as regards the 1939 Act houses. Among the provisions which were thus modified were those of s. 12 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and it was provided, among other things, that sub-s. (2) of that section should not apply to what have become known as " 1939 houses." Section 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, after defining the houses to which that Act was to apply, contained three provisos. The first provided that the Act shall not apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payment in respect of board, attendance, or use of furniture. The second provided:

> " . . . the application of this Act to any house or part of a house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade, or professional purposes," and the third—which, from our point of view, is the most important—provided:

> " . . . for the purposes of this Act, any land or premises let together with a house shall, if the rateable value of the land or premises let separately would be less than one quarter of the rateable value of the house, be treated as part of the house, but, subject to this provision, this Act shall not apply to a house let together with land other than the site of the house."

Those provisions still govern what I call pre-1939 Act houses, but they did not govern such a dwelling-house as the flat in the present case which is subject to restriction only by virtue of the Act of 1939. The gap thus created was, however, filled by s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 which provided:

> " Subject to the provisions of para. (a) of the last preceding sub-section [providing that the principal Acts should not apply to any dwelling-house consisting of, or comprising, premises licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor for consumption on the premises] the application of the principal Acts, by virtue of this section, to any dwelling-house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes ; and for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1938, as amended by virtue of this section, any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house shall, unless the land or premises so let consists or consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent, be treated as part of the dwelling-house ; but, save as aforesaid, the principal Acts shall not, by virtue of this section, apply to any dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house."

That, it should be observed, took the place of the third proviso to section 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, but with an alteration of the conditions under which land or premises let together with a house were to be treated as part of the dwelling-house. The first part of that sub-section may refer to all houses, though, so far as pre-1939 Act houses are concerned, it seems to be unnecessary in view of the second proviso to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920. The second part of the sub-section, I think, applies only to 1939 houses. That would seem to be the effect of the use of the words " the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1938, as amended by virtue of this section " instead of " the purposes of the application of the principal Acts." It appears to be necessary to construe s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 as applying only to 1939 houses, for, having regard to the wording of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1939, s. 12 (2), proviso (iii), of the Act of 1920 seems still to apply to pre-1939 Act houses.

The question we have to decide depends on the view we take of the effect of the second part of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939. Is its effect to make the additional land or premises part of the dwelling-house consisting of the flat only so that the standard rent would be that of the flat, namely, £135, or is it, as counsel for the landlords contends, merely to make it part of a new dwelling-house consisting of the garage and flat ? I agree with the learned judge that, taking the language of sub-s. (3) literally, the words must be construed in the former sense. The learned judge considered that he was bound in law so to hold by the decision of this court in Hemns v. Wheeler (1). Counsel for the landlords criticised this part of the learned judge's judgment, saying that in Hemns v. Wheeler (1) the court was concerned with s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, whereas we are concerned with a different sub-section, namely, s. 3 (3) of the

A Act of 1939, and that a decision on the one sub-section could not bind us in considering a different sub-section. I do not think, however, that the learned county court judge overlooked this point. I think he merely meant that the reasoning of TUCKER, L.J., in Hemns v. Wheeler (1) led him to decide the present case in favour of the tenant, applying the principle which TUCKER, L.J., applied in considering the relevant section of the earlier Act. With that
B conclusion I entirely agree. Section 3 (3) does not, in my view, make a radical change of law. It merely enlarges the effect of proviso (iii) to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 by increasing the extent of the land or premises which are to be treated as part of the dwelling-house. If I may borrow the language (1927 S.C. 567) of the LORD PRESIDENT (LORD CLYDE) in Haldane v. Sinclair (2):

> "This [the new section] is not so much a new conception, as a new > C test for applying the old conception."

While I am referring to that case I ought, perhaps, to refer to an argument addressed to us by counsel for the landlords to the effect that it was really a decision in his favour. He said that it supported the view that the addition of the garage to the flat constituted a change of identity which created a new dwelling-house, and he relied on various passages from the judgments of the D learned Lords of the Court of Session in that case. I think I should be sufficiently summarising the effect of those passages if I take the closing sentence of LORD BLACKBURN's judgment, where he said (ibid., 570):

> " . . . I do not think we should construe the sub-section as applying to a dwelling-house which, by conjunction with lands, has changed its identity from a dwelling-house to which the Act applies . . ."

E

With the decision in that case I respectfully agree. One must have regard to the facts and must bear in mind that under the finding of the sheriff substitute the rateable value of the land or premises let separately would have been more than one quarter of the rateable value of the house so that the Court of Session was not bound in that case to treat the land as part of the dwelling-house, and,
F indeed, I think it is plain that, in the circumstances there existing, the combination of the two created a dwelling-house outside the ambit of the Acts.

Hemns v. Wheeler (1) arose under the Act of 1920 and concerned s. 12 (2). The house in question had been damaged by bombs. It had been re-constructed, £97 being spent on repairing bomb damage and £100 on alterations and improvements, and a small area of land had been added. The only structural addition
G was some paving and an outside lavatory. The re-constructed house was first let after the Act of 1939 came into force, and the question which the court had to decide was whether the standard rent was 4*s*. 6*d*. a week under the Act of 1920, that being the rent at which it had been let before the bomb damage was done, or 15*s*. a week under the Act of 1939, as being the rent at which it was first let after Sept. 1, 1939. The county court judge decided, and this
H court held that there was evidence on which he was justified in so deciding, that there had been no change sufficient to make the house a new dwelling-house, but another point had been raised with which TUCKER, L.J., dealt. He says ([1948] 2 K.B. 66):

> "It may be stated as follows: The letting in October, 1942, was a complex letting of house plus added piece of land with yard and w.c. upon it. Can the standard rent of this complex unit be the same as that of the house by itself before the addition of this piece of land? This argument > has certain attractions, but in my view it cannot prevail. There is no doubt that the premises let in 1942 differed from those let in 1914 by reason of this added area of land, and, if we were concerned merely with the identity of the premises, it would, I think, be difficult to hold that the premises were the same ; but the Rent Restrictions Acts deal with dwelling-houses as distinct from premises. [His Lordship read proviso (iii) to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 and continued:] Note the words A ' treated as part of the house.' This results in a notional dwelling-house consisting of bricks and mortar plus land. I think that the policy of the Acts is, in effect, to ignore the existence of these small plots of land and added premises in ascertaining what is the dwelling-house. No doubt, where the rateable value of the added area exceeds one quarter of the rateable value of the house, the resulting premises will be excluded from B the Acts, but any addition of less rateable value not only keeps the house within the Acts but is ' treated as part of the house.' In the present case we have a dwelling-house, No. 25, Plymouth Street, let as a separate dwelling in August, 1914. In 1942 a piece of land, which has to be ' treated as part of the house,' is added. The dwelling-house remains the same, and it is, in my view, erroneous to say that this dwelling-house was not C let in August, 1914, merely because a piece of land has been added. Looked at in this way, Vaughan v. Shaw (3) and R. & P. Properties, Ltd. v. Baldwin (4) cited by Mr. Blundell do not, I think, really afford us any assistance. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails ; but, in so deciding, I desire to make it plain that I am not saying that the addition of a piece of land in connection with structural alterations and improve- D ments is not a relevant matter to be taken into consideration, as I think it was by the county court judge in the present case, on the issue of fact as to the identity of the dwelling-house."

Counsel for the landlords relied on the concluding sentence, but, in my opinion, Tucker, L.J., was limiting the purpose for which the additional land might be taken into account to the determination of the question which really only E arises, I think, where some such thing as structural alterations or improvements have been made, namely : Is the existing house the old house improved on in substance or is it a new house ? He had previously made plain his view that, if nothing had been done but to add land or premises, the addition must be ignored in ascertaining what is the dwelling-house.

Counsel for the landlords attempted to frighten us with the difficulties and F consequences he said would arise if we affirmed the decision of the learned county court judge. He gave us one illustration—the case of a house with three floors all of which were separately let on Sept. 1, 1939—the first at a rent of £50, the second at a rent of £60, and the third at £70. Later, the whole house was let at £180. The standard rent, he said, would be £50, £60 or £70, and no one could tell which. This was in substance the question which G arose for decision in this court under the Act of 1939 in Vaughan v. Shaw (3), the facts in which were that on Sept. 1, 1939, the house had been let in two parts to two separate tenants, there being no structural separation between the parts. In January, 1941, the house was let as a whole to the defendant. On an application by the landlord to fix the standard rent, the county court judge held that the standard rent was 32*s*. 6*d*., being an aggregate of the former H rents, but this court reversed the decision and held that the standard rent was the rent at which the house was first let as a whole after Sept. 1, 1939. Counsel very fairly admitted that the point we are now considering was not argued in that case, but he said—and I think he was right in saying—that the decision could have been supported on the ground that there was a new dwelling-house created by the conjoint letting. It seems to me, however, that the judgment can be supported, and that case reconciled, as Tucker, L.J., plainly thought it could be, with the decision in Hemns v. Wheeler (1), on the ground that when s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 speaks of " land or premises let together with a dwelling-house " it connotes the idea of something which is not capable of being itself a dwelling, and, therefore, where the land or premises consist of that which was, when last let, itself a dwelling-house, the sub-section has no applicability and the court can properly treat the new letting as the letting of a new dwelling-house and decide the question whether protection arises under the Act solely in relation to the rateable value of the conjoint premises.

For these reasons I think, as TUCKER, L.J., thought, that there is no inconsistency between the decision of Hemns v. Wheeler (1) and the decision of the county court judge in this case and the decision of this court in Vaughan v. Shaw (3) and subsequent cases founded on it. In this connection I should, perhaps, refer to Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Somerfeld (5) where the property had been subjected to violent bomb damage and a much reduced flat re-constructed out of the remains. The reduced flat was then let with a garage to a new tenant and a question arose similar to that with which we are now concerned but with the difference that, undoubtedly, the premises had been re-constructed. The learned county court judge in the present case said that he was now persuaded that his decision in that case was wrong in so far as it related to the supposed want of identity between a flat and a flat and garage, but that part of the case was not considered in the Court of Appeal according to the note of the case in [1948] W.N. 287, and I do not think that the learned judge's error on that particular point would have affected the decision which really turned on the question of re-construction. The other terror which counsel held over our heads was that, if this land were let with a factory on it, it might be of great value, but, if the learned county court judge's judgment stood, the tenant would be entitled to use the factory at the rent previously paid for the dwelling-house alone. I think the answer is that which the learned county court judge gave, namely, that the normal landlord would make his factory the subject-matter of a separate, independent demise. For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I have had considerable difficulty in reconciling Vaughan v. Shaw (3) with Hemns v. Wheeler (1), but this court is entitled to follow either, and I prefer to follow Hemns v. Wheeler (1). Accordingly, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Maintenance—Enforcement of order—Wife "residing with" husband—Parties living under same roof—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (c. 51), s. 1 (4), s. 2 (2).

A wife who had obtained a separation order on the ground of desertion made a complaint against her husband for failing to pay maintenance to her under the order. The husband pleaded that the order was not enforceable because the wife was residing with him within the meaning of s. 1 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, during the period for which maintenance was claimed. The justices found that the parties were residing under the same roof and expressed the opinion that the case was covered by Evans v. Evans ([1947] 2 All E.R. 656), but, having regard to the criticism of that decision by Denning, L.J., in Hopes v. Hopes ([1948] 2 All E.R. 920), they declined to follow it and directed the husband to pay the arrears of maintenance. On appeal, Held : Evans v. Evans had not been overruled ; it was the duty of the justices to follow that decision ; and, therefore, the maintenance order was not enforceable against the husband.

Case Stated by Essex justices.

A complaint was preferred by the wife before a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Chelmsford alleging that the husband, who had been ordered to pay her £2 weekly for her maintenance under a separation order, had failed to comply with the order. At all material times the wife was residing with the husband, but they occupied separate bedrooms, and, while both used the kitchen, the wife did no cooking for the husband. They spoke to one another when they met in the house, but did not come into contact with each other every day. The husband never used the sitting room. On behalf of the husband it was contended that the complaint ought to be dismissed on the authority of Evans v. Evans (1), but the justices ordered the husband to pay the arrears. The husband appealed and the Divisional Court now allowed his appeal.

Jellinek for the husband.
The wife did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Essex before whom the husband was summoned by his wife for having made default in the payment of sums of money which he had been ordered to pay to her under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925. The point which arises is exactly the same as that which arose in this court in Evans v. Evans (1). When the present case was before the justices their attention was called to that case and also to the criticisms which DENNING, L.J., in Hopes v. Hopes (2) had directed to the decision in it. The justices came to the conclusion that they ought to follow the dicta of DENNING, L.J., and, in view of his criticisms, not to follow Evans v. Evans (1). While, however, I can well understand the justices taking that view, I have to point out to them that Evans v. Evans (1) has not been overruled by the Court of Appeal, and that the part of the judgment of DENNING, L.J., in which he criticises the decision in Evans v. Evans (1) was entirely obiter. Reference to Evans v. Evans (1) was unnecessary for the decision in Hopes v. Hopes (2) and the other two members of the court, BUCKNILL, L.J., and HARMAN, J., did not mention the case.

The decision in Hopes v. Hopes (2) was that

> " . . . while de facto separation, which with animus deserendi is an essential element of desertion, can exist even while the parties are under the same roof, there can be no such separation until husband and wife cease to share one household and set up two households."

On the facts in that case the court held that there had been no de facto separation and, therefore, there was no desertion by the husband of the wife. In Evans v. Evans (1) the court had to construe s. 1 (4) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925. That Act amended the law, as I have explained both in Evans v. Evans (1) and Thomas v. Thomas (3), in this respect. Before that Act was passed a married woman could not obtain a maintenance order against her husband or apply to justices for a separation order unless she had left him. That was thought to be a hardship because it might often happen that a married woman could not afford to quit the home where she was living with her husband until she had a maintenance order against him. Therefore, this amendment was made which enabled a woman to apply for a maintenance order although she had not been forced to leave her husband and live separately and apart from him. The words of s. 1 of the Act are :

> " (1) An application by a married woman for an order . . . under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 . . . may be made notwithstanding that the cruelty or neglect complained of has not caused her to leave and live separately and apart from [her husband], and accordingly the words ' and shall by such cruelty or neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him ' in s. 4 of that Act are hereby repealed."

When the Act of 1925 was passed the only case in which this matter had been mooted was one to which DENNING, L.J., called attention in Hopes v. Hopes (2), viz., Jackson v. Jackson (4). There HILL, J., had thrown out a very guarded expression when he said ([1924] P. 26):

> " There may be desertion though the husband continues to live under the same roof . . . but in such case the facts must be very strong."

He did not decide the point whether there had been desertion or not. Therefore, when the Bill was before Parliament in 1925 this part of the law had only formed the subject of debate in the courts to a very limited extent, and it was in that state of affairs that Parliament passed this Act.

Section 1 (4) of the Act of 1925 provides :

> " No order made under the [Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895] shall be enforceable and no liability shall accrue under any such order while the married woman with respect to whom the order was made resides with her husband, and any such order shall cease to have effect if for a period of three months after it is made the married woman continues to reside with her husband."

To the court that decided Evans v. Evans (1) it seemed that the reason why Parliament included that provision was that it was an undesirable state of affairs if a married woman went before justices and obtained an order against her husband to maintain her and at the same time continued to live in the same house as he. Apart from the fact that by so doing she would be getting a benefit twice over, because the money that was given to her was intended to be for her board and lodging when she was living separately and she would be getting her lodging by still remaining with her husband, it would seem generally most undesirable that spouses should be living in the same house in those circumstances. I can think of nothing more likely to lead to general unhappiness and, perhaps, actual personal violence. That view is reinforced, in my view, by s. 2 (2) which provides :

> " Where a married woman with respect to whom an order has been made under the principal Act resumes cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him, or where she has before the date of the commencement of this Act so resumed cohabitation, and is at that date cohabiting with him, the order shall cease to have effect on the resumption of such cohabitation or at the commencement of this Act, as the case may be."

There the Act uses the expression " cohabitation," and it does not require a lawyer to understand the difference between " cohabitation " and " residence." The cohabitation of two people as husband and wife means that they are living together as husband and wife, the wife rendering wifely services to her husband and the husband rendering husbandlike services to his wife. They are living together, not merely as two people living in one house, but as husband and wife. I cannot believe that the draftsman of the Act who in s. 1 (4) has used the words " resides with " meant the same thing when in s. 2 (2) he used the word " cohabitation."

Denning, L.J., also referred to Hadley v. Perks (5), in which it is true that Blackburn, J., said (L.R. 1 Q.B. 457):

> " It has been a general rule for drawing deeds and other legal documents from the earliest times, which one is taught when one first becomes a pupil to a conveyancer, never to change the form of words unless you are going to change the meaning, and it would be as well if those who are engaged in the preparation of Acts of Parliament would bear in mind that that is the real principle of construction. But in drawing Acts of Parliament, the legislature, as it would seem, to improve the graces of the style, and to avoid using the same words over and over again, constantly change them ; and accordingly in s. 24 [of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839] we have ' having in possession or conveying in any manner anything,' whereas the words in s. 66 of the [Metropolitan Police Act, 1839] were ' having or conveying.' I think, however, that the two expressions were intended to mean the same thing. ' Having in his possession ' may perhaps have been introduced to meet the case of the person who arrested the man when he came to offer the goods for sale or pledge. But ' having or conveying ' I think must be limited, making the one co-extensive with the other, and confining it to ' having ' ejusdem generis with ' conveying '."

With great respect, I do not think that what that very learned judge was saying in that case as to what may result when Parliament uses different words in the same enactment can be applied to a case such as the present where one section of an Act of Parliament talks of a wife residing with her husband and the next section speaks of her cohabiting with her husband—a word which as between husband and wife has a very well-known meaning and one far in advance of the mere expression " reside with." Section 2 (2) obviously contemplates a wife going back to her husband in view of a reconciliation, because, unless there is a reconciliation, how can there be cohabitation ? If the wife, having obtained her order and having left her husband so that the order became effective, is taken back by her husband so that the cohabitation between the spouses is resumed, a very different state of affairs comes about and it is provided that the order shall come to an end.

A It was suggested by DENNING, L.J., that the effect of Evans v. Evans (1) if the decision was right, would be that a woman, having obtained an order, would only have to leave the house for a day or two, and then come back. He says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 925):

> " If Mrs. Evans, instead of getting back straight through the window, had stayed away a few nights so as to be able to say she had been ' living
> B apart ' from her husband, she would, apparently, have been able to enforce her order just as Mrs. Thomas [in Thomas v. Thomas (3)] did : but, because she had nowhere else to go she could not. It is impossible to suppose that the legislature intended such a result."

With respect, I will deal with that case when it arises. Under s. 1 (4), Parliament meant to deal with the case where the husband and wife were physically living
C under the same roof and in s. 2 (2) with the case where the husband and wife were cohabiting as husband and wife.

Evans v. Evans (1) has not been overruled, and it is, therefore, the duty of the justices to follow that decision unless and until it is overruled. This appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

D OLIVER, J. : I entirely agree.

STABLE, J. : I agree, but, with deference to the decision of the justices, I should like to add a few words. From experience I know that justices sometimes regard it as a reflection on themselves when this court reverses their decision, but, so far from that being so in the present case, I am struck by the very great care and attention the justices gave to this matter and the intelligent
E appreciation they gave to the reported cases that were brought to their notice. It can hardly be wondered at that the justices were led into error inasmuch as in Hopes v. Hopes (2), speaking entirely obiter, DENNING, L.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 926) : " Faced with this choice, I am of opinion that Evans v. Evans (1) was wrongly decided." Then he goes on : " Relieved of . . . Evans v. Evans (1), the law becomes consistent throughout this subject." It
F may be that the law is not always wholly logical, but neither is human behaviour, and the law is much more closely concerned with human behaviour than it is with logic. If human behaviour ceases to be logical, then the law has to keep pace with human behaviour, such as it is, and not as in a logical world it always would be. So far as Evans v. Evans (1) is concerned, I find it impossible to take the view that " resumes conhabitation " and " resides with "
G mean one and the same thing, and for the reason that, whereas the consequence of resumption of cohabitation is that the order immediately ceases to be of any effect and permanently expires, the effect of the wife residing with her husband is only to suspend the operation of the order during the period of residence. It is only if that residence lasts for three months that the order expires, and, in my opinion, that shows beyond any discussion that the two
H phrases bear a totally different meaning. With that in mind, if I may respectfully say so, not only is the decision in Evans v. Evans (1) binding on this court, but I agree with it.

Rent Restriction—"Separate dwelling"—Additional accommodation in same house—Separate tenancy agreements—Intention of parties—Treatment of both tenancies as one letting—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (2).

In 1925 the tenant, C., took a weekly tenancy of two first floor rooms in a house as a separate dwelling and used the rooms as such until 1933. In that year he was granted the tenancy of two rooms on the ground floor and two rooms in the basement of the same house. The two tenancies were distinct, and separate rent books were used in respect of them. After obtaining the second tenancy the tenant used the two first floor rooms as bedrooms, the ground floor rooms as a living room and kitchen and a workroom, one basement room being used as a larder. In 1948 the landlord claimed possession of the rooms on the ground floor and in the basement on the ground that they were not let as a "separate dwelling" within the Increase of Rent & Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2).

In 1916 L. became tenant of the ground floor and basement of a house. In 1946, by a separate tenancy agreement, he went into occupation of two rooms on the first floor of the same house. One of the first floor rooms was then used as a kitchen and the other as a living room, one ground floor room was used as a bedroom and the other as a workshop, and the basement rooms were used for storing coal and as a scullery. The landlord claimed possession of the ground floor and basement rooms on the ground that they were not let as a "separate dwelling" within s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920.

Held: applying the principles laid down by the Court of Appeal in Curl v. Angelo ([1948] 2 All E.R. 189) and Wright v. Howell (1947) (204 L.T.Jo. 299), it was impossible to hold that the rooms comprised in the second tenancy in the first case and in the first tenancy in the second case constituted the separate dwelling of the tenant since one of the essential operations of living, namely, in the first case sleeping and in the second case cooking and the occupation of the living room, was carried on in premises other than those claimed, but the circumstances in which and the purposes for which the second tenancy in each case was granted strongly indicated, although the second tenancy was in form a separate transaction, that the true intention of the parties was to treat both tenancies as one letting, or, at all events, so interdependent that neither could be determined without the other, and the cases must be remitted to the county court to decide whether the second letting in each case was separate and distinct from the first or whether the real agreement to be imputed to the parties involved such a consolidation between the lettings as to make a single tenancy extending over the whole of the premises.

Appeals from decisions of His Honour Judge Drucquer, sitting at Westminster County Court on Feb. 17, 1949.

The landlord of two houses situate at 5 and 6 Newburgh Street, Soho, London, applied for possession of parts of both houses on the ground that the parts in question did not constitute "separate dwellings" within the Rent Restrictions Acts and so were not protected by the Acts. It was not disputed that each tenant was protected as regards other parts of the house. Both applications were dismissed. The Court of Appeal remitted both cases to the county court to determine the question whether the second letting in each case was truly A a separate and distinct letting, or whether the real agreement involved a consolidation of the two lettings, and ordered the appeals to stand over generally and to be restored to the list for further argument after the county court had given its decision.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20. JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Westminster County Court dated Feb. 17, 1949, on a claim by the landlord (Mrs. Violet Lilian Wimbush) against C the tenant (Mr. Harry Cibulia) and his sub-tenant (a company called Dental Supplies and Services, Ltd.) for possession of the two ground floor and two basement rooms in No. 6 Newburgh Street, Soho, which was allowed in the county court only as regards the front room in the basement, being the part of the premises occupied by the sub-tenant. In addition to the four rooms already mentioned, the premises with which the case is concerned comprise two rooms D on the first floor of No. 6 Newburgh Street, of which possession is not claimed.

In 1925 the tenant took from the landlord's predecessor in title a weekly tenancy of the two first floor rooms at a weekly rent of 15*s.*, since increased to 16*s.* 8*d.* These two rooms were, undoubtedly, let to, and, in fact, used by, the tenant as a separate dwelling until 1933, his family who lived with him there consisting for the first three years or thereabouts of his wife and one E daughter. The front room was used as a bedroom and the back room as a kitchen, where cooking was done on a gas stove. In 1928 a son was born to the tenant, who asked the then landlord for further accommodation. The landlord advised him to wait a little while for accommodation in the same house. It seems that, in fact, he had to wait a matter of five years, but ultimately in 1933 the ground floor and basement fell vacant through the departure F of the former tenant (Mrs. Skell), and on July 21, 1933, the tenant was granted a weekly tenancy of this part of the house at a weekly rent of £1 1*s.* 6*d.*, since increased to £1 2*s.* 3*d.* This letting of additional accommodation was not effected, as one might have expected, by a simple substitution for the existing tenancy of a new tenancy comprising first floor, ground floor and basement at one entire rent. In point of form, according to the evidence of the rent G books, the transaction was carried out by keeping on foot the existing tenancy of the two first floor rooms and granting a separate tenancy at a distinct weekly rent in respect of the ground floor and basement. A new rent book was opened in respect of the ground floor and basement, and thereafter two separate rent books, one for each set of rooms, were consistently kept.

On becoming tenant of the ground floor and basement, the tenant reorganised H his accommodation, turning the first floor room formerly used as a kitchen into a second bedroom and using the back ground floor room as a kitchen and living room, the front ground floor room as a workroom for the purposes of his work as a jobbing tailor (which he had previously done away from home), and the back basement room as a larder. This reorganisation seems to have been carried out with the knowledge and approval of the landlord as the tenant, before he took the tenancy of the ground floor and basement rooms, told the landlord he would require the front ground floor room as a work room and the back ground floor room as a kitchen, and the landlord gave his consent to the installation of water in the back ground floor room. In 1935 (with the landlord's consent) the tenant let the front basement room (which was unsuitable as a living room) at 9*s.* per week to an electrical engineer for business purposes. This sub-tenant, after a period of absence during the war, assigned his sub-tenancy to the company already mentioned, which was a defendant in the action but has not appealed against the order for possession of the front basement room. In granting this sub-tenancy the tenant reserved to himself a right of way to the front coal cellar.

The mode of user of the various parts of the premises has continued as I have described down to the present time. Thus, although the tenant undoubtedly now occupies the first floor, ground floor and back basement room as one entire separate dwelling in which he carries on all the essential activities and concerns of life, he holds the first floor, on the one hand, and the ground floor and back basement room, on the other hand, under what in point of form appear to be two distinct contractual titles, and it is this circumstance that gives rise to the difficulty in the case.

In 1948 the landlord, having recently become the owner of No. 6 Newburgh Street subject to the tenant's occupation, served a notice to quit expiring on Sept. 20, 1948, in respect of the ground floor and the basement, and on its expiration she sued the tenant and the defendant company in the Westminster County Court for possession of the ground floor and basement and mesne profits. The particulars of claim alleged that the ground floor and basement were let and used for business purposes only and were not within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, while the two rooms on the first floor were let and used as a residence and were within such protection, but (except as regards the room let to the defendant company) the argument actully advanced in support of the claim to possession was to the effect that the ground floor and basement were not let as a separate dwelling within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2). It appears that the county court judge did not consider the possibility that, notwithstanding the formally separate character of the two lettings, the true intention of the parties may have been to create the equivalent of one tenancy comprising the whole of the premises which after the additional letting constituted in their entirety the tenant's home. The judge, however, found it possible to hold that the ground floor and basement (other than the room sub-let to the defendant company) were nevertheless protected by the Acts. His reasons for so holding are thus stated in his note of his judgment :

> "It is true that the family do not sleep on the premises although they could do so if they so chose. The former tenant, Mrs. Skell, used the workroom both as a workroom and as a bedroom for her daughter and there is nothing in the tenancy of Cibulia which prevents him from using the front room in the same manner if he chose to put up a bed, say, for his son. But be that as it may, in my opinion, the ground floor and basement is the true home of Cibulia. There he and his family meet, live and eat, howbeit they sleep upstairs. The food which the family eats and the coal which the family uses is kept in the basement. In my opinion, the tenancy is protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts."

We find ourselves unable to agree with the learned county court judge's conclusion. Applying the principles laid down by this court in such cases as Curl v. Angelo (1) and Wright v. Howell (2), we find it impossible to hold that the ground floor and basement of No. 6 Newburgh Street by themselves ever in point of user constituted the separate dwelling of the tenant apart from the first floor rooms originally let to him since at all times after the letting of the ground floor and basement to the tenant in 1933 one of the essential operations of living, namely sleeping, was carried on in the two first floor rooms. The circumstances in which and purposes for which the additional tenancy was granted do, however, seem to us to provide a fairly strong indication that, although the additional letting was in form a separate transaction, the true intention of the parties may well have been that the two tenancies should be treated as one " letting " or at all events should be interdependent, so that the later in date was supplemental to the earlier and the one could not be determined without the other. If that was the true position, in fact, then we think the result would be that the tenant could claim protection in respect of the whole of the premises consisting of first floor, ground floor, and back basement room in the same way as if they had all been comprised in a single tenancy agreement.

On the facts so far found, we would not feel justified in dismissing the appeal on this ground, while, on the other hand, in all the circumstances of the case we are not content without further investigation to accept at its face value the formally separate character of the two tenancies, with consequences fatal, as it seems to us, to the tenant's case. We are loath to put the parties to the trouble and expense of a further hearing in the county court, but matters of evidence and fact under the Rent Acts are pre-eminently matters for the county court, and we think, therefore, that the proper course in the circumstances will be to remit the case to the county court for a further hearing directed to the question whether the additional letting was truly separate and distinct from the original letting, or the real agreement to be imputed to the parties (conformably with the actual facts as to user) involved such a consolidation of or interdependence between the two lettings as to make them in effect equivalent to a single tenancy agreement extending to the whole of the premises.

The appeal should in the meantime stand over generally and be restored to the list for further argument when the question above stated has been dealt with in the county court. In considering this question the county court judge will bear in mind that the language of s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which speaks of a house or part of a house " let as a separate dwelling," does not in terms require that the letting should be by virtue of a single instrument or contract. Proviso (iii) to that sub-section and sub-s. (3) of s. 3 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, which relate to cases where land or premises have been " let with " a dwelling-house, seem to us clearly to contemplate the possibility of separate contracts or separate transactions, and cases under sub-s. (3) of s. 3 of the 1939 Act such as Merrill v. Mann (3) and Lewis v. Purvis (4) show that in such circumstances it is a question of fact whether or not the subject of each contract should be treated as intended to be and being separate and distinct from the other.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20. JENKINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This appeal (which in a sense is the converse of Cibulia's case) is from a judgment of the Westminster County Court dated Feb. 17, 1949, in so far as it dismissed a claim by the landlord (again Mrs. Violet Lilian Wimbush) against the tenant (Mr. S. Levinski) for possession of the ground floor and basement of No. 5 Newburgh Street, Soho.

The present rateable value of the whole house is £47. The tenant has been the occupying tenant of the ground floor and basement in question (each consisting of two rooms) ever since the year 1916 when they were let to him at the weekly rent of 15*s.* From the commencement of his tenancy down to the year 1918 the tenant used the front ground floor room as a workshop for the purposes of his business as a jobbing tailor, the back ground floor room as a bedroom for himself and his wife, the front basement room for the combined purposes of a bedroom for his two daughters and a living room for the family, and the back basement room as a kitchen. In 1918 the tenant took a further room on the second floor of the same house, paying the increased weekly rent of £1 11*s*. 6*d*. for all five rooms. The second floor room was used as a bedroom for the two daughters who had formerly slept in the living room, but otherwise the user of the four ground floor and basement rooms remained as above described.

In 1940 one of the daughters left home on getting married and the other went into the country to avoid the air raids. The bedroom on the second floor thus became superfluous and the tenant relinquished it, reverting (at a weekly rent which now stands at £1 1*s*. 2*d*.) to his original tenancy of the four ground floor and basement rooms, the user of which remained the same as before down to January, 1946. So far it is plain that the ground floor and basement from 1916 to 1918 and from 1940 onwards, and between 1918 and 1940 those four rooms plus the bedroom on the second floor, had constituted part of a house let to the tenant as a separate dwelling within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2), and that in January, 1946, his tenancy of the four ground floor and basement rooms was within the protection afforded by the Rent Restrictions Acts. In January, 1946, however, the tenant took from the same person as was then his landlord in respect of the ground floor and basement a weekly tenancy of additional accommodation in the same house, consisting of two rooms on the first floor. As in Cibulia's case, this letting of additional accommodation was effected, in point of form at all events, by keeping the existing tenancy on foot in respect of the ground floor and basement and granting a separate tenancy at a distinct weekly rent (apparently of 17*s*. per week, since increased to 17*s*. 11*d*.) in respect of the first floor. As in Cibulia's case, a new rent book was opened in respect of the additional rooms, and thereafter two separate rent books, one for each set of rooms, were consistently kept.

On obtaining these additional two first floor rooms the tenant reorganised his accommodation and thereafter used and is still using one of the first floor rooms as a kitchen, the other as a living room, the ground floor front and back rooms as a workshop and bedroom respectively as before, the front basement room for storing coal and the back one (which has apparently been condemned for use as a kitchen) as a scullery for washing clothes. The case thus affords a precise parallel to Cibulia's case in that the respondent occupies as one entire separate dwelling premises held under what in point of form at all events are two distinct contractual titles, but it is the converse of Cibulia's case in that the premises of which possession is here sought are those comprised in the original, and not (as in Cibulia's case) the additional letting. In 1948 the landlord, who had recently become the owner of No. 5 Newburgh Street subject to the tenant's occupation, served a notice to quit expiring on Sept. 13 of that year in respect of the ground floor and basement, and on its expiration sued the tenant in the Westminster County Court for possession of the ground floor and basement, arrears of rent amounting to £53 16*s*. 0*d*. down to Sept. 13, 1948, and mesne profits at the rate of £1 1*s*. 2*d*. per week from that date. No question arises in this appeal as to the claim for arrears of rent, which was admitted, the sum claimed being paid into court by the tenant and paid out to the landlord under the judgment.

By her particulars of claim the landlord alleged that the tenant held two parts of the premises (that is, the two first floor rooms, on the one hand, and the ground floor and basement, on the other hand) on two separate and distinct tenancies, and that the ground floor and basement were let to the tenant for business purposes only and were used by him for the purposes of his trade or business as a tailor (an allegation which, if made good, would exclude them from the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts), but admitted that the two first floor rooms (possession of which was not claimed) were let to and used by the tenant for residential purposes and were within the protection afforded by the Rent Restrictions Acts. Before the county court judge and in this court the claim to possession of the ground floor and basement was supported on grounds different from those pleaded. The contention urged on the part of the landlord A was that as from the date of the letting to the tenant of the two first floor rooms and his consequential reorganisation of the accommodation at his disposal the ground floor and basement ceased to be let as a separate dwelling within the meaning of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, and, consequently, ceased to qualify for protection under the Acts. As in Cibulia's case, the county court judge appears to have addressed himself solely to the question whether the B ground floor and basement rooms, considered by themselves and apart from the two first floor rooms, were let as a separate dwelling within the meaning of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920. He, nevertheless, found himself able, as in Cibulia's case, to hold that the ground floor and basement were protected by the Acts, for reasons thus expressed in his note of his judgment :

> C " In my opinion, the tenancy consisting of the ground floor and basement is still protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. It is the same dwelling-house as the defendant occupied from 1916 to 1918 and from 1940 to 1946, and the only difference in user is that instead of using the basement as a living room and kitchen, he uses them as a storage for coal for domestic purposes and as a scullery for washing clothes for domestic purposes. In D my opinion, the fact that for greater ease and comfort he has taken two rooms on the first floor on a separate tenancy for a living room and the kitchen does not affect the question."

On the footing that the two lettings are to be treated as truly distinct and independent, this conclusion is open to objections similar to those we have stated in Cibulia's case. The essential activities here carried on in the first floor E rooms and not in the ground floor and basement being cooking and the activities normally carried on in a living room. There is, however, a not unimportant distinction in favour of the tenant in the present case (as opposed to Cibulia's case) in that here the ground floor and basement were the subject of the original letting and were undeniably let to the tenant in the first instance as a separate dwelling and used and occupied by him as such for many years. We prefer F to express no opinion at this stage as to the sufficiency of this distinction as a ground for upholding the decision in favour of the tenant even on the facts as at present found, but we think, for the same reasons as we have given in Cibulia's case, the right course in the circumstances will be to make the same order as in that case, that is to say, to remit the case to the county court for further hearing on the same question which we have stated in Cibulia's case, G the appeal in the meantime to stand over generally and be restored to the list for further argument when that question has been dealt with in the county court.

Order in the terms of the judgment : appeals adjourned generally.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Stable, JJ.), July 14, 25, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Trial—Retirement of jury—Separation after being given in charge of bailiff—Permission by recorder to leave court and take luncheon together—Power to order new trial—Duty of counsel to bring irregularity to notice of court. A

The appellant was charged at quarter sessions on an indictment containing counts for both felony and misdemeanour. He was acquitted on all charges of felony, but was convicted on eight charges of misdemeanour and was sentenced. After the summing-up had been concluded and the jury had been given in charge of the bailiff, the recorder gave them permission to leave the court to have luncheon together, and they did so. B

HELD: (i) the permission given to the jury to leave the court and the custody of the bailiff after they had been charged was so serious an irregularity and departure from recognised legal procedure that the appellant's conviction must be quashed.

R. v. Ketteridge ([1915] 1 K.B. 467), applied. C

(ii) the irregularity did not result in the trial being a nullity, and, therefore, the court had no power to order a new trial.

R. v. Ketteridge (supra), disapproved on this point.

Semble: if other offences are taken into consideration when passing sentence in such a case, the accused can be tried afterwards for those offences. D

Per curiam: If some irregularity comes to the knowledge of counsel before the verdict is returned he should bring it to the attention of the court at the earliest possible moment so that the presiding judge may consider whether or not to discharge the jury without giving a verdict. Matters of this sort ought not to be held in reserve with a view to taking them before this court when it may be, as here, too late to remedy the mistake. E We desire to emphasise that, if an irregularity arises in a trial which can be cured and it is not brought timeously to the attention of the court of trial, it does not by any means follow that this court will allow advantage to be taken of it when it is too late to remedy it except by quashing the conviction.

APPEAL against conviction at Nottingham Quarter Sessions.

The appellant having been convicted and sentenced on charges of misdemeanour, it was contended on his behalf that the dispersal of the jury, with the leave of the recorder, after they had been charged but before verdict, B was such an irregularity that the convictions could not stand. The Court of Criminal Appeal allowed the appeal. The facts appear from the judgment of the court delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Cowley for the appellant.

Nigel Robinson for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

C July 25. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The court has already intimated that this appeal is allowed and the conviction quashed, and we now proceed to give our reasons. The appellant was charged before the recorder of Nottingham on an indictment containing 26 counts, two of which were withdrawn from the jury. Of the remaining counts some were for larceny of monies and others for fraudulent conversion. D The jury acquitted on all charges of larceny and convicted on eight charges of the misdemeanour of fraudulent conversion. The appeal is not brought on any ground of misdirection or misreception of evidence. In fact the merits of the case do not enter into consideration at all, but it appears that after the summing-up was concluded and the jury given in charge of the bailiff they sent a message to the learned recorder asking that they might be allowed to E leave the court for the purpose of getting luncheon. The learned recorder has reported to this court that what happened was that, after the jury had been absent for about half an hour they sent a message asking if they might have lunch together during the mid-day adjournment and leave the court for that purpose. He gave them permission to do so after referring to ARCHBOLD'S PLEADING, EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE, 31st ed., p. 194, where it is stated that the F jury must not leave the place appointed for their deliberations after they have retired without the special permission of the court. He appears to have treated that as meaning that he could give them permission to leave the court, and, accordingly, he did so. After the jury had given their verdict, counsel for the defence mentioned the matter to the recorder who said : " I understand they did disperse—I do not know what the period was—for the luncheon interval." G The recorder then heard evidence of character and proceeded to judgment.

The point that is now taken on behalf of the appellant is that the dispersal of the jury after they had retired to consider their verdict was an irregularity which was contrary to law, and that, consequently, the conviction must be quashed. There is no doubt that to deprive an accused person of the protection given by essential steps in criminal procedure amounts to a miscarriage of justice H and leaves the court no option but to quash the conviction : per LORD SUMNER in Crane v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1), and the question is whether or not this was an essential departure from well established rules of criminal procedure. Certainly no member of this court has ever heard of a jury being allowed to leave the building or to depart from the custody of the bailiff once they have been enclosed for the purpose of considering their verdict. It is well known that to avoid juries being kept locked up without refreshment it is a common practice for the presiding judge to break off his summing-up to allow the jury to obtain their luncheon or other refreshment and afterwards to complete his charge. There is no case to be found in the books where a jury, once given in charge of the bailiff, have been allowed to leave the building for any purpose whatever. It is laid down in Coke on Littleton, 19th ed., p. 227b, that a jury must not, until they are agreed, separate or leave the place appointed for their deliberations, though that must now be read in conjunction with cases which have decided that it is within the discretion of the court to discharge a jury who are unable to arrive at a verdict. Reference need only be made for this purpose to Winsor v. R. (2). In Blackstone's Commentaries (1876 ed. (Kerr)), vol. 4, p. 374, it is stated that " the jury cannot be discharged (unless in cases of evident necessity) till they have given in their verdict . . . "

The matter was considered by this court in R. v. Ketteridge (3), where the court decided that, if a juror, after the judge has summed-up in any criminal trial, separates himself from his colleagues, and, not being under the control of the court, converses or is in a position to converse with other persons, it is an irregularity which, in the opinion of the court, renders the whole proceedings abortive. We can see no reason why, if this is the case where a single juror goes out so as not to be under the control of the court and is in a position to converse with other persons, it can make any difference if the whole of the jury leaves the court unattended. Indeed, it would appear to be an a fortiori case. It is unnecessary to consider what might be the position if the court permitted them to go to some place for refreshment under the charge of the bailiff. It may be that in such a case the position would be no different from that which obtained in murder cases until the recent legislation which permits a jury to separate for the night because it is well known that when the court rose for the day the jury were taken in the custody of the bailiff or bailiffs to an hotel where they stayed for the night and were brought back in the same custody to the court the next day. This might still happen if the court in its discretion refused to allow them to separate.

In truth, the statement in Archbold is too wide and should be qualified by some such words as " to be given only in cases of evident necessity." No doubt, if a juror is taken ill or wishes to relieve himself, the court can permit the bailiff to take him from the jury room for the purpose of medical attention or of going to the water closet, but he must remain in the charge of the bailiff. If the illness is not a mere passing indisposition, the judge could, no doubt, discharge the juryman as he could if he was taken ill in the box, and, under the provisions of the recent statute, could take a verdict provided the jury were not reduced below ten. Before that statute, if any one or more of the jury were taken ill and could not continue their deliberations without danger, the duty of the judge was to discharge the jury without giving a verdict and to order the trial to take place again. This is clear from the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Winsor v. R. (2). In our opinion, when the recorder allowed the jury to leave the court and go into the town after they had been charged, and thereby to leave the custody of the bailiff who had been sworn to keep them in some private and convenient place, there was so serious an irregularity and departure from the procedure recognised by law that we have no option but to quash the conviction, as was done in Ketteridge's case (3).

It may also be observed that s. 35 (4) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, reinforces the view which we have expressed because it is provided by that section that on the trial of any person for an offence on indictment the court may, if it thinks fit, at any time before the jury consider their verdict, permit them to separate. It may be said in this case that there was no evidence before the court that the jury did separate. They had asked if they might leave and have luncheon together, but whether they sat at one table or more than one, whether they went to the same place for luncheon or to different ones, they ceased to be under the control of the court and were out of the custody of the bailiff, and that, in our opinion, constitutes the irregularity.

Before leaving this part of the case we desire to make an observation for the guidance of counsel, should a similar case arise in the future. If some irregularity comes to the knowledge of counsel before the verdict is returned he should bring it to the attention of the court at the earliest possible moment
A so that the presiding judge may consider whether or not to discharge the jury without giving a verdict. Matters of this sort ought not to be held in reserve with a view to taking them before this court when it may be, as here, too late to remedy the mistake. In this connection we call attention to the concluding passages of LORD SIMON's speech in Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (4). In the present case the irregularity should have been mentioned to the recorder
B before the jury returned their verdict, but it seems clear that, had this been done, the result would have been the same. The recorder believed, after his reference to ARCHBOLD, that he had power to give permission to the jury to leave the court, and counsel had not, nor could it be expected that he would have, the authorities at hand to deal with such an exceptional situation. Accordingly, there is no reason to suppose that, had he mentioned it before
C verdict, the recorder would have acted otherwise than he did. In these peculiar circumstances we are attaching no blame to counsel who was faced with a situation which might well have disconcerted the most experienced practitioner. We desire, however, to emphasise that, if an irregularity arises in a trial which can be cured and it is not brought timeously to the attention of the court of trial, it does not by any means follow that this court will allow advantage
D to be taken of it when it is too late to remedy it except by quashing the conviction.

The point now arises whether the court, having quashed the conviction, should order an acquittal or make some other order under the special provisions of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, as was done in Crane's case (1). The question is, then : Has the court power to order a further trial by awarding
E a venire de novo. At first, when this matter was discussed, the court inclined to the view that they could set aside the verdict and order a venire de novo. In R. v. Ketteridge (3) ([1915] 1 K.B. 470) LUSH, J., giving the judgment of the court, said that the only course open to the court was to discharge the jury and to commence the proceedings afresh, and a few lines further down he said : "It is, of course, open to the Crown to re-commence
F the proceedings." It will, however, be observed that the question whether the court had power to order a re-trial had not been argued. No doubt, if it is brought to the attention of the court, before the verdict is given, that the jury have separated, the court should at once discharge them from giving a verdict and order the proceedings to begin de novo, but both in R. v. Ketteridge (3) and in the present case the verdict was delivered and recorded
G and judgment was given.

In our opinion, if it transpires that there has been a mis-trial, then, whether the offence amounts to a felony or to a misdemeanour, the court can order the case to be re-tried, but in order that it may be said that it is a mis-trial the circumstances must be such as render the trial a nullity from the outset. In R. v. Crane (1), which was one of felony, the appellant was indicted for the H offence of receiving stolen goods. There was a separate indictment against the thief. No doubt, by some oversight the two prisoners were given in charge of the same jury and were tried together, and both were convicted and sentenced. It seems that the clerk of the peace at the Leicester City Sessions, having the two indictments before him, arraigned the prisoners as though they were jointly indicted, and the fact that there were separate indictments was not brought to the attention of the recorder or of the counsel in the case. The House of Lords held that the trial was a nullity and that there must be a fresh trial, and other cases can be found in the books in which this course has been taken in cases both of felony and of misdemeanour. Most of them will be found collected in the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Winsor v. R. (2) (L.R. 1 Q.B. 318), from which it is clear that, if there has been such an irregularity as would make the trial a nullity or if the jury return a wholly imperfect verdict, the court can direct a venire de novo even in the case of a felony. The law was much considered in R. v. Murphy (5), following on R. v. A Bertrand (6), and SIR WILLIAM ERLE, in stating the advice which the Judicial Committee would tender to Her Majesty, in R. v. Murphy (5), said (L.R. 2 P.C. 548):

> "The cases in which a verdict upon a charge of felony has been held to be a nullity and a venire de novo awarded have not been classified in the Digests; there are cases of defect of jurisdiction in respect of time, place, B or person—cases of verdicts so insufficiently expressed, or so ambiguous, that a judgment could not be founded thereon; but we have not discovered any valid authority for holding a verdict of conviction or acquittal in a case of felony delivered by a competent jury before a competent tribunal in due form of law to be a nullity by reason of some conduct on the part of the jury which the court considers unsatisfactory." C

We think that this applies, not only to a charge of felony, but also to one of misdemeanour. Moreover, whereas in this case the indictment charges both felonies and misdemeanours as it can do under the Indictments Act, 1915, but could not do before, it is quite clear that if a venire de novo were awarded the whole indictment would have to be tried over again, and so the charges of felony of which the prisoner was acquitted would have to be re-tried as D well as the misdemeanours of which he was convicted. But that, in the opinion of the court, is not the governing consideration. This trial cannot in any sense be said to have been a nullity because of an irregularity on the part of either judge or jury after all the evidence had been heard and the summing-up had taken place. Down to that point everything was regular and in order. We think a test of what would amount to a mis-trial sufficient to render the E trial abortive and void would be whether the irregularity would be patent on the record if it were drawn up. If, for instance, the record in Crane's case (1) had been drawn up it would have appeared that there were two indictments and not a joint indictment. Both indictments would have had to be set out, and yet one verdict was returned and one judgment delivered. So too, if an indictment were preferred at quarter sessions which quarter sessions had no F jurisdiction to try, there would be a patent defect at once apparent on the record. The prisoner would never have been in peril of a lawful sentence being passed on him, and there would have been no trial. Or, again, it might appear that only eleven jurors were empanelled, for when the record was drawn up in former days the names of all the jurors sworn appeared thereon. In R. v. Cronin (7) the recorder of a borough was unable to be present and had G appointed a deputy to sit in his place and it afterwards appeared that the deputy had not the necessary qualification. The conviction, therefore, was coram non judice and the conviction was quashed and a venire de novo directed. That is an instance where the irregularity would not appear on the record. There are also several cases, most of which will be found referred to in Winsor's case (2), of verdicts so defective or ambiguous H that no judgment could be founded thereon. In all this class of case the trial has been and could only be treated as a nullity, but it is impossible to hold that the reasoning on which those cases depend applies to the circumstances of the present. We think we are entitled to treat what the court said in R. v. Ketteridge (3) as merely obiter. It will be observed that the court there did not order a venire de novo, and, as we have already said, they expressed an opinion on a matter which had never been argued.

We are, therefore, of opinion that we have no power to order a re-trial in this case and that all we can do is to quash the conviction. We point out that after verdict the appellant asked that a large number of similar cases should be taken into consideration. It is, therefore, open to the Crown still to proceed against him, if so advised, in respect of those cases, because, since the decision of this court in R. v. Nicholson (8), it is clear that autrefois convict cannot be
A pleaded where cases have been taken into consideration but the substantive conviction has afterwards been set aside. It was there pointed out that taking offences into consideration was in no sense a conviction on them. They were merely taken into consideration so as to prevent the prisoner being re-arrested and charged when he came out of prison from serving the sentence passed on the indictment. It may be that the court increases the sentence, but it still
B has to be one which the offence charged in the indictment would carry. It has been held in this court that a prisoner charged with the misdemeanour of attempting to break and enter, who asked for other offences, whether of breaking and entering or attempting to do so, should be taken into account, could not receive a sentence in excess of two years because the sentence must be one justified by the indictment on which judgment was passed. It is not for us to
C say whether the Crown should proceed. We only point out that they can do so if they choose.

Conviction quashed.

At all material times the tenants occupied a flat, the rateable value of which was within the limits prescribed by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1), which was let to them by the landlords
G at a rent of which a substantial portion was fairly attributable to the use of furniture in the flat and a small part to attendance provided by the landlords. On a claim by the tenants under s. 9 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (as amended by sched. I to the Act of 1939), which provides for the limitation of the rent of houses let furnished and for the repayment to tenants by landlords of the H amount of rent paid by the tenants in excess of that which would yield to the landlords a "normal profit" within s. 9 (2) of the Act,

HELD: (i) s. 9 (1) by its terms applied to any dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied; s. 12 (2), proviso (i), of the Act of 1920 (as amended by s. 10 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923) excepted from the Acts houses let at a rent which included payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture which formed a substantial portion of the whole rent, but only "save as otherwise expressly provided" ; for the purpose of effecting a limitation of rent s. 9 (1) was an express provision "otherwise" ; and, therefore, the flat was within the Rent Restrictions Acts and the tenants could avail themselves of the provisions of s. 9 (1).

(ii) s. 9 (1) applied although the rent paid by the tenants included payment for attendance as well as for the use of furniture.

Appeal by the landlords from a decision of His Honour Judge Bensley Wells at Marylebone County Court awarding the tenants, under s. 9 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, £14 10*s*. 0*d*. as payment made by them to the landlords in respect of rent for a furnished flat yielding to the landlords a profit in excess of the normal profit as defined by s. 9 (2). The facts appear in the judgment of Asquith, L.J. the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. C

Norman King for the landlords.

F. A. Hopkinson for the tenants.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask Asquith, L.J., to read the first judgment. D

ASQUITH, L.J. : This is an appeal by landlords from a judgment of His Honour Judge Bensley Wells at the Marylebone County Court, awarding the tenants £14 10*s*. 0*d*. (with costs) under s. 9 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I. So amended the sub-section reads as follows: E

> "Where any person lets, or has, since the beginning of the date of the passing of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, let any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, or any part thereof, at a rent which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture, and it is proved to the satisfaction of the county court on the application of the tenant that the rent charged is yielding or will yield to the landlord a profit in excess of the normal profit as hereinafter defined, the court may order that the rent, so far as it exceeds such sum as would yield such normal profit shall be irrecoverable, and that the amount of any payment of rent in excess of such sum which may have been made in respect of any period after the commencement of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, shall be repaid to the tenant." F G

Sub-section (2) (as amended) provides:

> "For the purpose of this section, 'normal profit' means the profit which might reasonably have been expected from a similar letting in the year ending on Sept. 1, 1939." H

The material facts, which were not in dispute, were that from Jan. 22, 1947, to Mar. 5, 1948, the tenants occupied a flat in Maida Vale let to them by the landlords at a rent of £3 13*s*. 6*d*. a week. The flat was fully furnished and certain attendance was also provided, such as the removal of rubbish, use of telephone, etc., and a certain amount of laundering. It was common ground between the parties that a substantial part of the rent was attributable to attendance and the use of furniture, but not that a substantial part of the rent was attributable to attendance alone. The attendance seems to have been trifling, and when the learned county court judge found that the flat was fully furnished he impliedly found, I think, that the part of the rent referable to use of furniture was substantial. In March, 1948, the tenants were given notice to quit. They applied to a rent tribunal and secured a reduction in the rent for the future. By plaint issued on Apr. 2, 1948, they claimed under A s. 9 (1) to recover £58 14*s.* 6*d.* as rent overpaid in the past, being £1 0*s.* 3*d.* a week in respect of the period Jan. 22, 1947, to Mar. 5, 1948. The landlords resisted the claim, but it succeeded as to £14 10*s.* 0*d.* The present appeal is from the award of this sum.

The landlords' contention is that s. 9 (1) does not apply. By its express terms, they argue, it only applies to " dwelling-houses to which this Act applies,"
B and this flat, they say, is not such a dwelling-house. In support of this contention they rely on proviso (i) to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, which I will call for short " the proviso." The body of s. 12 (2) (now amended by subsequent legislation) provides that the Act shall apply to dwelling-houses whose rateable value does not exceed specific figures, and the proviso reads as follows:

> " . . . this Act shall not, save as otherwise expressly provided, apply
> C to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of board, attendance, or use of furniture."

This proviso is now modified by s. 10 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which provides:

> " For the purposes of proviso (i) to sub-s. (2) of s. 12 of the principal > D Act (which relates to the exclusion of dwelling-houses from the principal Act in certain circumstances), a dwelling-house shall not be deemed to be bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture unless the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to the attendance or the use of the furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, forms a substantial portion of the whole rent."

E The landlords say that this flat is a dwelling-house which is bona fide let at a rent a substantial part of which is fairly attributable to the use of furniture, and that, in consequence of the combined effect of the provisions just cited, it is not a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply, and so is not within s. 9 (1) and no claim can be made by the tenants under that sub-section. The county court judge rejected this contention and I think he was right.

F The phrase " a dwelling-house to which this Act applies " recurs constantly in the Acts. In construing it in particular contexts regard must be had to the two distinct governing purposes of this body of legislation. Those two purposes, notoriously, are (i) to prevent increases in rents beyond moderate and prescribed limits, and (ii) to protect tenants from eviction by limiting or suspending the landlord's claim to possession. A dwelling-house is a " dwelling-house to which G this Act applies " for the first purpose, namely, limitation of rent, if its rateable value is below certain figures specified in the Act—in London £100, but that without more will not make it a " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " for the second purpose, namely, protection from eviction. To secure this last type of protection a further condition must be satisfied, namely, that the contractual tenancy must have been terminated by notice to quit, effluxion
H of time, or the like, and replaced by a so-called statutory tenancy. Section 9 of the Act of 1920 is directed purely to limitation of rent, and in such a setting the natural meaning of " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " is a dwelling-house which (if in London) has a rateable value not exceeding £100. That and no more. Roppel v. Bennett (1), cited by the tenants and relied on by the county court judge, is a good illustration of the distinction I have indicated between the two purposes for which a dwelling-house can be " a dwelling-house to which this Act applies." For the purposes of the claim, which was a claim to possession, the house (a substantially furnished house) was held by virtue of the proviso not to be a dwelling-house to which the Act applied, but for the purposes of the counterclaim, namely, for recovery of rent overpaid, it was held to be a " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " within s. 9 (1).

That case is binding on this court, and, in my view, is conclusive of this appeal on this particular point. But, out of respect for the argument addressed to us on behalf of the landlords and as these points were not expressly taken before the court in that case, I will refer to one or two other considerations which, in my view, point in the same direction. The proviso contains the words " save as otherwise expressly provided," and I am clearly of opinion that s. 9 (1) " expressly provides otherwise." For simplicity, and to deal with an argument much relied on for the landlords, I will first consider the meaning and interaction of these two provisions as at a time after the Act of 1920 had come into force but before that of 1923 had done so. In this period the proviso prima facie removed from the protection of the Act for all purposes (whether limitation of rent or protection from eviction) all houses let furnished, but the words " save as otherwise expressly provided " in effect carved out an exception in the proviso to the extent of the operation of s. 9 (1). The latter section, therefore, applied to all furnished lettings and conferred the protection given by the section—not from eviction, but only from uncontrolled rises in rent—in the cases of " dwelling-houses to which this Act applies." In its context the last phrase could only mean dwelling-houses within the limits of rateable value (or in 1920 of rateable value or rent) set out in the relevant section of the Act in force from time to time. On the landlords' view of its meaning, s. 9 (1) could not have operated on anything. On their view s. 9 (1) applied to dwelling-houses let furnished " to which this Act applies " and the proviso says there are no such houses. But, it is argued, we are not living in 1920, 1921, or 1922, and since 1923 the proviso has been qualified by s. 10 (1) of the Act of that year. This section limits the operation of the proviso (where furniture is concerned) to what may be called for short substantially furnished lettings. Hence, so the argument runs, when you now consider s. 9 (1) and construe the phrase " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " in that sub-section, you must make allowance for the change introduced by the Act of 1923. The phrase now means dwelling-houses (with, of course, a rateable value within the limits specified in the Acts) let furnished, but not substantially furnished, for the latter are taken out of the Acts by the proviso and the 1923 Act. The judge has found that the flat in this case was let substantially furnished (this is implied in his expression " fully furnished "). Ergo, the flat is not a " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " within s. 9 (1) and no claim lies under that sub-section. I do not find this argument convincing, apart from its being contrary to the ratio on which Roppel v. Bennett (1) was decided by this court. If before 1923 " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " in s. 9 (1) meant no more than a dwelling-house within the limits of the rent or rateable value laid down by the Acts, the enactment of s. 10 of the 1923 Act has not, in my view, given it a wider meaning. The phrase continues to mean what it then did and no more. The point, however, can be left open, as it was left open in Riordan v. Minchin (2), since in this case there was a " substantially " furnished letting and such lettings are for reasons given above certainly covered by s. 9 (1). The answer to the landlords' first point may be summarised thus : (i) Section 9 (1) only applies to " dwelling-houses to which this Act applies." (ii) The body of s. 12 (2) (as amended by subsequent Acts) defines such dwelling-houses as dwelling-houses whose rateable value does not exceed certain prescribed figures. (This flat so far is within the class as defined). (iii) But from this class of dwelling-houses the proviso (as modified by s. 10 (1) of the 1923 Act) prima facie excepts dwelling-houses let at a rent a substantial amount of which is referable to attendance or furniture. (This flat is within the class so excepted).

But (iv) The proviso is prefaced with the words "save as otherwise expressly provided." These words carve out an exception from the exception to the extent of the operation of s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1920 and s. 10 of the Act of 1923, to which alone they can refer. This flat is within the exception to the exception, and, therefore, is a "dwelling-house to which this Act applies" within the meaning and for the purposes of s. 9 (1). (For a different purpose—recovery of possession—the flat would be outside the protection of the Acts).

A The landlords, however, rely more strongly on a second point. This is that, assuming counsel is wrong on his first point, nevertheless s. 9 (1), while it applies in terms to tenancies where the rent covers occupation of the premises plus use of furniture, does not apply in terms to tenancies where the rent covers occupation of the premises plus use of furniture plus attendance, or any other extra besides furniture, for example, board. B In the absence of some clear implication from the context or otherwise imparting a special meaning to the words used in a statute, they are to be construed in their ordinary literal and grammatical meaning. What is the ordinary grammatical meaning of s. 9 (1) ? According to this standard the words "let at a rent which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture" would appear to be satisfied where the rent includes such payments and also payments in respect of attendance. C A lease is none the less a lease at a rent covering use of furniture because the rent also covers some other service. A man wearing a hat and a coat is none the less a man "wearing a hat" because he is also wearing a coat. It is not clear why after "furniture" we must read in the words "and no other extra."

The present tenancy seems, therefore, to fall within the words in question. D It is true that such a construction would enable the county court judge, on proof that the rent included an element attributable to the use of furniture, to control the whole rent, notwithstanding that it also included elements attributable to other components, for example, attendance or board or both and that one can imagine cases in which these other components might be very large. That is true, but it seems to me a result which, though possibly unintended, flows from the words used whem construed in their primary sense. E The subsection goes on to provide that where it is proved to the satisfaction of the county court judge . . . that the rent charged is yielding or will yield a profit in excess of the normal profit, he may order the excess to be irrecoverable. In this passage, the "rent charged," again construed in its ordinary meaning, must mean the rent in fact charged under the lease in question, and, if that rent covers furniture plus attendance or some other extra, it is none F the less the rent charged, and it is in relation to that rent that the county court judge must perform the calculation prescribed by the section. I cannot see that there is any clear or necessary implication from the context or otherwise to modify the construction which I have indicated. It has been suggested that in a case in which the rent includes use of furniture plus some other extra, for example, attendance, the county court judge, in applying the section and G comparing the profits with the corresponding 1939 "normal" profits, should ascertain and eliminate from both sides of the account the element attributable to attendance. The section, however, does not say so. It is not a necessary implication, and it would add yet another baffling complication to a task, complex enough already in all conscience, which the Acts impose on county court judges. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be H dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I also think that the appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, J.: I agree.

Criminal Law—Rape—By husband on wife—Separation order in force.

The accused was charged on indictment, by the first count, with the rape of his wife on Mar. 12, 1949, and, by the second count, with an assault on her occasioning actual bodily harm on the same date. The accused and his wife were married on Oct. 8, 1938, and on Mar. 2, 1949, the wife obtained a separation order containing the usual clause providing that she was no longer bound to cohabit with the accused. The wife had not resumed cohabitation at the time of the alleged offence. On a motion to quash the first count of the indictment on the ground that it disclosed no offence known to the law,

Held: as a general proposition of law a husband cannot be guilty of a rape on his wife, but where justices had made an order containing a provision that a wife be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband the consent to marital intercourse impliedly given by the wife at the time of the marriage was revoked thereby and the husband was not entitled to have intercourse with her without her consent, with the result that he could be guilty of a rape.

Motion to quash a count in an indictment.

The facts appear in the headnote and the judgment.

Veale for the accused.
Stanley-Price for the Crown.

BYRNE, J.: In the first count of the indictment the defendant is charged with raping his wife. His counsel has moved to quash that count on the ground that it does not disclose any offence known to the law.

As a general proposition it can be stated that a husband cannot be guilty of a rape on his wife. No doubt, the reason for that is that on marriage the wife consents to the husband's exercising the marital right of intercourse during such time as the ordinary relations created by the marriage contract subsist between them. The marital right of the husband in such circumstances exists by virtue of the consent given by the wife at the time of the marriage and not by virtue of a consent given at the time of each act of intercourse as in the case of unmarried persons. Thus, the intercourse is not by virtue of any special consent, but is based on an obligation imposed on the wife by reason of the marriage. In Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol. 1, p. 629, the learned author states the law in this way:

> "... by their mutual matrimonial consent and contract the wife hath given up herself in this kind unto her husband, which she cannot retract."

In the present case, the justices made an order on Mar. 2, 1949, on the ground of the husband's persistent cruelty containing a provision that the wife be no longer bound to cohabit with the husband. That order has the effect in all respects of a decree of judicial separation, and one result of it is that both the person and the property of the wife are protected by it. It could be discharged if the wife committed adultery or if she voluntarily resumed cohabitation with A her husband, and by "cohabitation," as I understand it, is meant intercourse when the parties have begun to live together again, or intercourse although they are not living under the same roof. In this case at the material time the wife had not resumed cohabitation. The position, therefore, was that the wife, by process of law, namely, by marriage, had given consent to the husband to exercise the marital right during such time as the ordinary relations created B by the marriage contract subsisted between them, but by a further process of law, namely, the justices' order, her consent to marital intercourse was revoked. Thus, in my opinion, the husband was not entitled to have intercourse with her without her consent. For these reasons, this motion fails.

The husband then pleaded " Not Guilty " and was tried. Verdict: " Not Guilty " on the indictment on both counts.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Stable, JJ.), July 15, 1949.]

E Criminal Law — Sentence — Supervision — Discharged prisoner — Notification of address to appointed society — " Convicted on indictment " — Person committed for sentence to quarter sessions—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 22 (1), (2), s. 29 (1).

By the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (1): "Where a person who is not less than 21 years of age (a) is convicted on indictment of an offence F punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more; and (b) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions since he attained the age of seventeen of offences punishable on indictment with such a sentence, then, if the court is satisfied that it is expedient with a view to his reformation . . . the court may pass, in lieu of any other sentence, a sentence of corrective training for such term of not less than two nor G more than four years as the court may determine." By s. 22 (1): "Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person (a) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training or imprisonment . . . the court, if it sentences him to a term of imprisonment of twelve months or more, shall, unless having H regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison be subject to the provisions of this section." By s. 22 (2), where an order is made under s. 22 (1), the offender, on his discharge from prison, is to give his address to an appointed society. By s. 23 (1): "For the purpose of determining whether an offender is liable to be sentenced to corrective training or preventive detention or to be ordered to be subject to provisions of the last foregoing section, no account shall be taken of any previous conviction or sentence unless notice has been given to the offender and to the proper officer of the court at least three days before the trial that it is intended to prove the conviction or sentence ; and unless any such previous conviction or sentence is admitted by the offender the question shall be determined by verdict of a jury." By s. 29 (1), if justices deal summarily in respect of an indictable offence and convict a prisoner and, on obtaining information in regard to A his character and previous record, consider that a greater punishment should be inflicted than they have power to inflict, they may commit him to custody to quarter sessions for sentence. By s. 29 (3): " Where an offender is so committed for sentence as aforesaid, the following provisions shall have effect, that is to say: (a) the appeal committee or court of quarter sessions shall inquire into the circumstances of the case, B and shall have power to deal with the offender in any manner in which he could be dealt with by a court of quarter sessions before which he had just been convicted of the offence on indictment." By s. 29 (3) (d), if quarter sessions pass a sentence which justices would not have had power to pass, the offender may appeal against the sentence to the Court of Criminal Appeal.

C

The appellant was convicted by justices of larceny and committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1948. The recorder passed a sentence of corrective training under s. 21 (1), but, before doing so, he failed to obtain from the appellant an admission in regard to previous convictions or to obtain a verdict of a jury on the question as required by s. 23 (1). On an appeal against the sentence to D the Court of Criminal Appeal on the ground that the provisions of s. 23 (1) had not been complied with, the Court of Criminal Appeal substituted a sentence of imprisonment for the sentence of corrective training. The question then arose whether or not an order could be made on the appellant under s. 22 (1), as the opening words of the sub-section are: " Where a person is convicted on indictment . . ."

E

Held : an offender who had been committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1948 was to be treated for all purposes as though he had been convicted on indictment, and, therefore, he was subject to the provisions of s. 22. As, however, the procedure required by s. 23 (1) applied to s. 22, and had not been followed in this case, an order could not be made on the appellant under s. 22 (1).

F

Appeal against sentence.

The appellant was convicted of larceny by justices of the city of Leicester and was committed to quarter sessions for sentence under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29 (1). The recorder of Leicester passed a sentence of four years' corrective training under s. 21 (1) of the Act, but, before doing so, he omitted to obtain an admission from the appellant in regard to previous convictions G or to have the question determined by the verdict of a jury as required by s. 23 (1) of the Act. The appeal from this sentence was allowed by the Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Streatfeild and Devlin, JJ.), on June 21, 1949, and the court substituted a sentence of imprisonment for the sentence of corrective training. The question then arose whether or not an order could be made on the appellant under s. 22 (1) of the Act requiring H him to notify his address on discharge under s. 22 (2), and the case was stood over for argument on this question. On July 15, 1949, before the present court, it was contended for the appellant that, as the opening words of s. 22 (1) are: " Where a person is convicted on indictment," the sub-section could not apply to the appellant, because he was not convicted on indictment. The court held that an offender who had been committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1948 was to be treated for all purposes as though he had been convicted on indictment, and, therefore, he was subject to the provisions of s. 22, but, as the provisions of s. 23 (1) applied to s. 22 as well as to s. 21 (1) and had not been complied with, an order could not be made on the appellant under s. 22 (1).

A LORD GODDARD, C.J. [delivering the judgment of the court.] The appellant, having been convicted of the larceny of a motor car, was sentenced by the recorder of the city of Leicester, to four years' corrective training under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (1). His appeal against that sentence was before the court on June 21, and, for reasons which the court then gave, B the court set aside the sentence of corrective training because the conditions laid down in the statute before such a sentence could be passed had not been fulfilled. The court substituted a sentence of imprisonment for the sentence of corrective training. It is desirable that it should be remembered by all courts, both of assize and quarter sessions, that, before a sentence of corrective training or of preventive detention can be passed, the convicted C person must be asked whether he admits the convictions of which notice has been given and which will render him liable to a sentence either of corrective training or preventive detention. He must be asked specially the question whether he admits the convictions. If he says "Yes," no more need be done. If he denies the convictions, it must be decided by a jury whether he was the person who was previously convicted.

D Another point arises in this case. Section 22 (1) of the Act of 1948 provides:

> "Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person (a) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training or imprisonment ; or (b) has been previously convicted of an offence for which he was sentenced to corrective E training, the court, if it sentences him to a term of imprisonment of twelve months or more, shall, unless having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison be subject to the provisions of this section."

F The provisions of the section are that he shall give his name and address to an appointed society so that they can keep watch on him. It was contended that, as the section says "where a person is convicted on indictment," it cannot apply in the present case. Section 29 (1) of the Act, however, introduces a new procedure whereby, if justices deal summarily in respect of an indictable offence and convict the prisoner, and then, on hearing his character and previous G record, consider that it is a case in which a more severe sentence should be passed than they have power to inflict, they may commit him in custody to quarter sessions for sentence. By s. 29 (3):

> "Where an offender is so committed for sentence as aforesaid, the following provisions shall have effect, that is to say: (a) the appeal committee or court of quarter sessions shall inquire into the circumstances H of the case, and shall have power to deal with the offender in any manner in which he could be dealt with by a court of quarter sessions before which he had just been convicted of the offence on indictment . . . (d) if the appeal committee or court of quarter sessions passes a sentence which the court of summary jurisdiction would not have had power to pass, the offender may appeal against the sentence to the Court of Criminal Appeal as if he had been convicted on indictment ; and the provisions of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, shall apply accordingly."

In the opinion of the court, it is intended that, where an offender has been committed to quarter sessions for sentence, although he has not been convicted on indictment, he is for all purposes to be treated as though he had been convicted on indictment. He has, in fact, been committed by the justices to quarter sessions for sentence, and it is important that it should be remembered that, when he has been committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1948, under s. 29 (3) (d) he can appeal to this court against the sentence passed on him by quarter sessions if the sentence is one which the justices would not have had power to pass. If the legislature had not intended that he was to be in the same position as a person convicted on indictment, it would not have given him the right to appeal to this court. The court has no doubt that the intention of the Act is that an offender who has been committed to quarter sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) is to be treated for all purposes as though he had been convicted on indictment, and, therefore, if the sections are otherwise applicable, he becomes subject, not only to the provisions of s. 22 (1), with which we have just been dealing, but also to the provisions of s. 20 (1), which empowers the court to pass a sentence of Borstal training, and to s. 21 (1). In the present case, however, the procedure required by s. 23 (1) of the Act had not been carried out, with the result that the sentence of corrective training had to be set aside. As the provisions of s. 23 (1) apply to s. 22, it follows that the appellant cannot be ordered to notify his address on being discharged from prison as required by s. 22 (1) and (2).

Appeal allowed. Sentence of imprisonment substituted for sentence of corrective training.

[House of Lords (Viscount Jowitt, L.C., Viscount Simon, Lord Greene, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord MacDermott and Lord Radcliffe), June 14, 15, July 29, 1949.]

Gaming—Debt—Recovery of money alleged to be won on wager—New consideration—Agreement to pay by instalments—Promise by bookmaker not to report to Tattersalls' committee—Enforceability of agreement—Gaming Act, 1845 (c. 109), s. 18.

The Gaming Act, 1845, s. 18 provides: " All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made . . . "

As a result of betting transactions with the respondents, a firm of bookmakers, the appellant lost £3,635 12*s.* 6*d.* In April, 1946, the appellant being unable to pay, the respondents referred the matter to the committee of Tattersalls who, on July 22, 1946, decided that the appellant should pay the respondents £635 12*s.* 6*d.* within fourteen days and the balance by monthly instalments of £100. If the appellant failed to make these payments, he was liable, at the instigation of the respondents, to be reported to the committee of Tattersalls which would result in his being warned off Newmarket Heath and posted as a defaulter. On Aug. 15, 1946, the appellant informed the respondents that he was unable to pay the £635 12*s.* 6*d.* and offered to send them a cheque for that sum post-dated Oct. 10, 1946, and to pay the monthly instalments of £100 thereafter. On Aug. 17 the respondents replied, agreeing that, if the post-dated cheque was honoured and the balance of their account was paid by instalments commencing November, 1946, they would refrain from reporting the appellant to the committee of Tattersalls. To this letter the appellant replied on Aug. 20, enclosing the post-dated cheque and agreeing to pay the monthly instalments. On presentation the cheque was dishonoured and the appellant failed to make any payments to the respondents except one of £335 12*s.* 6*d.* on Oct. 19, 1946, which the respondents accepted without prejudice to their rights under the contract. On Feb. 21, 1947, the respondents issued a writ claiming payment of £700 as due to them under the agreement of Aug. 20, 1946. The respondents contended (i) that the sum which the appellant had promised to pay was not money " won upon a wager " within the second branch of s. 18, but was money due under a new lawful and enforceable agreement ; and (ii) that, even if the sum was to be regarded as won on a wager, it was nevertheless recoverable because the second branch of s. 18 was concerned only with suits seeking to enforce the gaming and wagering contracts or agreements dealt with in the first branch of the section, and the agreement of Aug. 20, 1946, was not such a contract or agreement.

HELD (VISCOUNT JOWITT, L.C., LORD OAKSEY, and LORD RADCLIFFE dissenting) : (i) although the agreement contained a new promise by the appellant for good consideration, it was a promise to pay money " won upon a wager " and the respondents' action was brought to recover money alleged to be so won ;

(ii) the second branch of s. 18 did not relate only to suits brought on wagering contracts declared void by the first branch, but applied to all suits brought to recover money alleged to have been won on a wager, and, therefore, the contract was unenforceable.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Tucker and Evershed, L.JJ.), dated May 13, 1948, dismissing the appeal of the appellant from a decision of Hallett, J., dated July 7, 1947.

The respondents, a firm of bookmakers, sued the appellant for a sum of money lost to them by the appellant as the result of betting transactions. They contended that, the parties having entered into a new agreement, whereby the appellant promised to pay the sum in question on the respondents' undertaking not to report him to the committee of Tattersalls, the case was taken out of the provisions of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, and the appellant's promise to pay was enforceable. Hallett, J., and the Court of Appeal, following the decision in Hyams v. Stuart King (1), upheld this contention, but the House of Lords now decided by a majority that Hyams v. Stuart King (1) had been wrongly decided and allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the opinions of Viscount Jowitt, L.C., Viscount Simon and Lord Normand.

Salmon, K.C., and Faulks for the appellant.

The House took time for consideration.

July 29. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT JOWITT, L.C. : My Lords, this was an appeal by the defendant in the action, one Tom Hill, from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming the decision of Hallett, J. The relevant facts lie within a small compass although the point raised is one of difficulty.

The appellant, some time before July, 1946, had had betting transactions with the respondents, William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd., as a result of which he had lost in bets the sum of £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*. He did not pay, and following the common practice the case was reported to the committee of Tattersalls by the respondents. This committee heard evidence and adjudicated on the subject-matter of the complaint on July 22, 1946. They decided that £3,635 12*s*. 6*d*. was due from the appellant and decided further that this sum ought to be paid by a payment of £635 12*s*. 6*d*. within fourteen days and the remaining £3,000 by monthly instalments of £100. The discrepancy between the sum of £3,865 12*s*. 6*d*. and £3,635 12*s*. 6*d*. was due to the fact that £200 of the larger sum had been lost in betting on dog races, with which the committee of Tattersalls had no concern.

It is, of course, clear that this decision of Tattersalls did not create any obligation enforceable at law. All that committee had done was to fix the amount of the wagers due in respect of horse racing and to give a decision as to the manner in which it would be proper for the appellant to discharge the amount so fixed. If the appellant were to fail to pay in accordance with the decision of the committee of Tattersalls, it might have entailed consequences which would have been unpleasant for him, for, at the request of the respondents, Tattersalls' committee would have reported his failure to the stewards of the Jockey Club and the appellant would have been warned off Newmarket Heath and his name would have been posted as a defaulter. We were informed that the appellant was an owner of race horses, and the result of being so warned off would have been that he would have been prevented from running horses in his own name, and would not have been entitled to attend race meetings under the jurisdiction of the stewards of the Jockey Club. Moreover, if he was known to have been posted as a defaulter, it would be unlikely that reputable bookmakers would be willing to accept any bets he might desire to make. Counsel on both sides disclaimed the idea that the respondents would have been acting harshly or improperly had they decided to report the appellant if he failed to carry out the decision of Tattersalls' committee. The threat so to act would, no doubt, have been intended to bring pressure on the appellant to pay, but the cause for so acting would have been so eminently reasonable and proper that I cannot think any question of blackmail arises and I agree with the submission that counsel on both sides made to us on this point. In fact, the appellant did not pay the £635 12*s.* 6*d.* within fourteen days of July 26, 1946, and the following letters then passed between the parties:

A "Ye Olde Chequers Inne,
Cutnall Green, Nr. Droitwich.
Telephone—Cutnall Green 228.
Aug. 15, 1946.

Wm. Hill, Ltd.,
London.

B Dear Sir,

I am sorry that I have not yet been able to comply with the order made against me by Messrs. Tattersalls but as my financial position at the moment is bad I have not been in a position to do so. The best I can do at the moment is to send you a post-dated cheque for Oct. 10 for £635 12*s.* 6*d.* and the rest as agreed by Tattersalls. If you cannot see C your way clear to accept this offer, then I am afraid there is nothing else I can do.

Yours faithfully,
Tom Hill."

To this letter the respondents replied by the letter of Aug. 17, 1946, in the following terms:

D "Tom Hill, Esq.,
Ye Olde Chequers Inne,
Cutnall Green,
Nr. Droitwich.

Dear Sir,

E re Account—£3,835 12*s.* 6*d.*

We have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, in which you state that up to the present you have been unable to comply with the order of Tattersalls' committee of the 22nd ultimo. We note your suggestion that you are prepared to forward to us a cheque for £635 12*s.* 6*d.* post-dated to Oct. 10, 1946, the balance of our account of F £3,200 to be paid in monthly instalments of £100 as adjudicated by the committee of Tattersalls. We agree to your suggestion, and in consideration of your forwarding your cheque for £635 12*s.* 6*d.* post-dated to Oct. 10, 1946, and of the said cheque being honoured by the bank, and in further consideration of the balance of our account of £3,200 being paid by instalments of £100 commencing November, 1946, and each subsequent month G thereafter until our account is clear, we on our part will refrain from enforcing the order made by Tattersalls' committee on July 22, 1946.

Yours faithfully,
for William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd."

The appellant replied in the following letter of Aug. 20, 1946:

"Ye Olde Chequers Inne,
H Cutnall Green, Nr. Droitwich.
Telephone—Cutnall Green 228.

Wm. Hill, Ltd., Aug. 20, 1946.

Dear Sirs,

With reference to your letter of the 17th inst. re account £3,835 12*s.* 6*d.* I am enclosing cheque for £635 12*s.* 6*d.* post-dated to Oct. 10 as agreed with instalments of £100 per month commencing in November to follow.

> Thanking you for your helpful consideration in this matter and assuring you that as soon as my financial position improves I shall do all I possibly can to settle this account as soon as possible,
> Yours faithfully,
> Tom Hill."

The letter of Aug. 17, 1946, was an offer from the respondents which was accepted by the appellant in the letter of Aug. 20, 1946, with the result that a contract was concluded in the terms of these letters. It will be observed that the concession as to time for payment provided for in the contract was substantially greater than that which had been allowed by the decision of Tattersalls' committee, and that so long as payment was made in accordance with this contract, the respondents were precluded from "enforcing the order made by Tattersalls." In other words, they were precluded from trying to have the appellant warned off or posted during a period of nearly three years which would have been involved in making the payments in accordance with the contract.

The post-dated cheque due on Oct. 10, 1946, was not honoured. The first payment which was made was an amount of £335 12*s.* 6*d.*, and this was made on Oct. 19, 1946, and was accepted by the respondents without prejudice to their rights under the contract. The appellant had made no further payment down to the date of the issue of the writ, which was specially endorsed. The endorsement was as follows:

> "STATEMENT OF CLAIM
> The plaintiffs' [respondents] claim is for the sum of £700 0*s.* 0*d.* instalments in arrear and payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs under an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant on Aug. 20, 1946.

The only question that falls for decision in this case is whether the contract concluded by the letters of Aug. 17 and 20 is enforceable at law. It was agreed by counsel on both sides during the argument, that the contract so made was a genuine contract; that it was made for good consideration; that it was not merely a colourable device to obtain payment of a bet; and that it was not a contract "by way of gaming or wagering." The trial judge was, apparently, of the same opinion for he states his view as follows:

> "I think this is a plain case where the defendant [appellant] made a fresh bargain in August in consideration of the plaintiffs [respondents] refraining from following up the procedure with Tattersalls' committee which would inevitably have led to the defendant [appellant] being then and there posted as a defaulter and warned off Newmarket Heath."

We have not been furnished (no doubt as a result of a laudable desire to cut down the amount of printing) with much of the material which was available to the trial judge. For example, we have not had an opportunity of reading the evidence which was given before the trial judge and we have not been supplied with copies of all the letters to which he referred in his judgment. In the result, we have not had sufficient material on which to question the view of the trial judge, but, as I have said, counsel did not ask us to do so and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of his decision.

It is no doubt true that the contract arose out of a wager. If there had been no wager and no money lost as a result of that wager such a contract would never have been concluded, but long before this contract was concluded the last transaction by way of gaming and wagering had taken place and the event A on which the wager depended had been ascertained. Such a contract is, therefore, unquestionably valid and enforceable unless there is some statutory provision which renders it unenforceable, and such a statutory prohibition is to be found, if at all, in s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, which is in the following terms:

> " All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way B of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void ; and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made."

There follows a proviso that " this enactment " shall not be deemed to apply C in certain conditions which are not here material. Since this contract was admittedly not a contract " by way of gaming or wagering " it is not, therefore, affected by the first limb of this section. It is said, however, that the contract comes within the second limb " no suit shall be brought . . . for recovering any sum of money . . . alleged to be won upon any wager." I cannot regard this limb of the clause as having any such far reaching effect as to invalidate D such a contract as is here in question. It is, to my mind, as a matter of construction, to be treated rather as a provision dealing with procedural matters which are to be the consequences of the simple proposition (stated in the first limb) that all contracts by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void. I find support for this view from the use of the word " alleged ", from which it is clear that the prohibition contained in the second limb is only to operate E if there is the appropriate allegation. The words we have to construe are not " no suit shall be brought for recovering any sum of money won upon any wager " and it would, I think, be doing violence to the words if we were so to construe them. The mere bringing of an action (even although the action, when the facts came to be investigated, might prove to be based on a contract which was by way of gaming or wagering and therefore null and void) might F bring a defendant who was resisting such an action into public disrepute. The section, therefore, provides that, if it is apparent that the declaration was based on a contract by way of gaming or wagering, the action should be struck out in limine.

It is argued that the second limb of this section relates to contracts which, though not by way of gaming or wagering, have some historical connection G with the payment of a bet. The consequences of this view would, I think, be very far reaching, and I have difficulty in seeing where to draw the line. It is not fanciful to suppose that a man who has lost a bet and has not at his immediate disposal funds to pay that which he owes in respect of the bet, might sell a chattel or indeed an estate to the person to whom he had so lost money on terms more favourable than he would have demanded if there had been no H bet and no resulting debt of honour. For example, if the appellant had owned a horse worth £X and had sold it to the respondents for £X-Y in full settlement of all obligations, would such a contract be avoided ? I agree that if such a contract were a mere device to make a bet enforceable at law—in other words if the contract were " colourable " —it could not be enforced, but unless this is the test which separates enforceable contracts from those that cannot be enforced, I find it difficult to find any test. I cannot think that the legislature, if it had intended by the second limb of the section to add such an important provision to the substantive law enacted by the first limb, would have left the whole matter in this state of uncertainty.

In his powerful dissenting judgment in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) Fletcher Moulton, L.J., thus deals with the problem ([1908] 2 K.B. 723) :

> " Finally it was suggested before us that there was a contract, not to pay the bet, but to pay a sum equal to it in amount, and that the consideration of that contract was a promise not to tell of the defendant's default . . . A But if such a contract had been formally made, it would not, in my opinion, better the position of the plaintiff. I should unhesitatingly hold that such a contract was only colourable, and that the real intention of both parties was that the bet should be paid. Even apart from this, the alleged contract would, in my opinion, be unenforceable. If a son loses a bet of £20 which he cannot pay, it makes no difference, in my mind, whether the bookmaker B says 'I will tell your father if you don't pay the bet,' or 'I will tell your father if you don't give me £20.' In the one case he is trying to get a contract to pay the bet, and in the other case a contract to pay blackmail. Neither of these contracts will be enforced by the courts."

For reasons I have already given I do not regard this contract as colourable, C and I certainly do not regard it as a contract to pay blackmail, and counsel on both sides in the present case agree with me on both these points. If I thought the contract merely colourable, I should regard it as null and void by reason of the first limb of the section. If I thought the contract was a contract to pay blackmail, it would plainly not be enforced by the courts. Yet these are the only answers suggested by Fletcher Moulton, L.J., to such a contract as he D predicated in that case and to such a contract as we find in the present case. In my view, this was a genuine and bona fide contract made for good consideration to pay a sum of money which—if its " present value " be regarded—was substantially less than the amount which the appellant had lost to the respondents by betting on horses, and (by reason of the delay in paying the first instalment) was substantially less than the amount which the committee of Tattersalls had E decided should be paid. I cannot think that such a contract is invalidated merely because as a matter of history some of its provisions can be traced back to a bet.

It was argued that we were bound to construe the second limb of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, as extending the provision expressed in the first limb, because, if the second limb were confined to contracts by way of gaming and wagering, F it would in fact be tautologous. It is, of course, true that the second limb of the section is unnecessary and tautologous if it adds nothing to the first limb, but if it is regarded as procedural it is, I think, possible to give it a sufficient meaning. Moreover, it might have some effect in the case of wagers concluded abroad which were the subject of litigation in this country. But, my Lords, even if the second limb is to be regarded as tautologous, it would certainly not G be the first time in which the legislature had indulged in tautology, and it is interesting to observe that in the Gaming Act, 1892, almost the same words are used in a context in which they are plainly tautologous.

The words contained in the second limb of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, were considered by Alderson, B., in Moon v. Durden (2) (2 Exch. 41) to be " redundant " and by Parke, B. (ibid., 44), to be " surplusage." In Varney H v. Hickman (3) Maule, J., expresses his view as follows (5 C.B. 280) :

> " Now, the first branch of this section declares the contract to be null and void : the second prevents the winner from bringing an action to recover the amount of the bet from the loser : and the third prevents the winner from sueing the stakeholder. It certainly is true that the second branch is involved in the first ; that is to say, that if, the section had stopped at the end of the first branch, it would have followed that no action could be > brought to enforce a contract so declared to be void. But I apprehend there is nothing unusual in an Act of Parliament stating a legal consequence in this way."

CRESSWELL, J., says (ibid., 282):

> " . . . the second branch of that section may be superfluous, or it may have been inserted ex abundanti cautela. It is extremely difficult to say
A what may be the purpose for which it was introduced."

In Diggle v. Higgs (4) LORD CAIRNS, L.C., expresses his view of the section thus (2 Ex.D. 427):

> "The section amounts to this: all contracts by way of gaming and wagering are null and void; and then, dealing with those contracts, it says
B that no action shall be brought with respect to them: that is to say, all gaming contracts are void, and the winner of the game or wager shall not maintain a suit against his antagonist or the stakeholder. This construction makes one member of the section in unison with the other."

COCKBURN, C.J., expressed his doubt on the point, but was not prepared to differ from the view expressed in Varney v. Hickman (3). BRAMWELL, L.J., expresses
C his agreement with the view of LORD CAIRNS and adds (ibid., 429):

> "I only wish to add that the clause of s. 18, that 'no suit shall be brought for recovering money won upon a wager' is unnecessary, and might have been left out of the statute; it seems to me to be wholly superfluous."

It is no doubt the fact that these expressions of opinion were not strictly necessary
D for the decision of the point then before the courts, but they do indicate the view which great masters of the law have taken with regard to the true construction of the section, and I find support in them for the construction which I have myself arrived at independently of these cases. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right and I should be in favour of dismissing this appeal.

E VISCOUNT SIMON: My Lords, the conclusion to be reached by the House in this appeal will determine the answer to a question which has been the subject of considerable debate among legal text-writers and commentators for forty years past, viz., whether the decision arrived at by the Court of Appeal in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) is good law. In that case, the promise, at the request of the loser of a bet, by the winner not to present or seek to enforce
F payment of the loser's cheque for the amount he had lost, together with the winner's promise not to expose his default, was held by the majority of the court (SIR GORELL BARNES, P., and FARWELL, L.J.) to be good consideration for a new and enforceable agreement by the loser to pay what was owing. Inasmuch as forbearance to claim prompt payment of an unenforceable debt like a bet cannot constitute good consideration for a legally binding promise
G to pay the amount later on, the real point of the decision of the majority was that the promise not to expose the loser's default to his detriment constituted effective consideration, in consequence of which the sum owing could be recovered in an action. FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., delivered a dissenting judgment, holding that the language of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, prevented the winner from recovering in the action the sum sued for, as in his opinion it was "a sum
H of money alleged to be won upon a wager," notwithstanding that the fresh promise had been made. The present appellant admits that, if the view of the majority in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) is correct, his appeal must fail, but he contends that the minority view of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., correctly construes the section and that by applying this view to the facts of the case now before us the appeal should succeed.

The relevant facts in the present case are as follows. As a result of betting with the respondents the appellant lost, on balance of account, the sum of £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*., all but £200 of which was lost in betting on horse-racing. In April, 1946, the appellant declared himself unable to pay and the respondents thereupon referred the matter of their claim against the appellant to the committee of Tattersalls. This committee concerns itself solely with bets on horse-racing and, after hearing evidence, made an order in respect of the £3,635 12*s*. 6*d*. so lost, directing the appellant to pay to the respondents the sum of £635 12*s*. 6*d*. forthwith and thereafter to pay the remainder of the gambling debt at the rate of £100 per month. So far, there can be no question that the debt, though a debt of honour, was not a debt payment of which could be enforced by law, for the promise to pay it, by the first words of s. 18, was "null and void." What followed, however, is said by the respondents to constitute a new agreement which is untouched by the section. If the order made by Tattersalls' committee is not complied with, the unpaid bookmaker, according to a well-established practice, may invite the committee to send to the loser what is called "the usual ten day letter." This is a letter calling on the loser to comply with the committee's order within ten days and stating that, failing such compliance, the committee will report the matter to the stewards of the Jockey Club. It would automatically follow from this course of proceeding that the loser is "warned off Newmarket Heath" and is thereby precluded from entering a horse for any race or appearing on any race course controlled by the stewards of the Jockey Club and, in effect, from placing any further bets with bookmakers on horse-races. Before any application had been made for the ten day letter, the appellant, on Aug. 15, wrote to the respondents stating that he was not able to comply with the order made by Tattersalls' committee, but sending a cheque for £635 12*s*. 6*d*. post-dated Oct. 10, and offering monthly instalments of £100 thereafter. On Aug. 17 the respondents replied in a letter headed "re Account £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*." noting the appellant's statement that up to the present he had been unable to comply with the order of Tattersalls' committee and agreeing that, if the post-dated cheque was honoured and if "the balance of our account of £3,200" was paid by instalments commencing November, 1946, "we on our part will refrain from enforcing the order made by Tattersalls' committee." To this the appellant replied on Aug. 20 enclosing the post-dated cheque and agreeing to pay the monthly instalments. The cheque, on due presentation, was dishonoured and the appellant failed to pay any instalments. Ultimately, he sent a cheque for £335 12*s*. 6*d*. which was accepted by the respondents without prejudice and was duly met. On Feb. 21, 1947, the respondents issued a specially endorsed writ in which their claim was stated to be "for the sum of £700 instalments in arrear and payable by the defendant [appellant] to the plaintiffs [respondents] under an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant on Aug. 20, 1946." The appellant got leave to defend on filing an affidavit stating that the money claimed had been won on wagers on horse-races and setting up s. 18 of the Act of 1845 as an answer. HALLETT, J., gave judgment in favour of the respondents, holding that the case fell within the decision in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) inasmuch as "the defendant made a fresh bargain in August in consideration of the plaintiffs' refraining from following up the procedure with Tattersalls' committee which would inevitably have led to the defendant being then and there posted as a defaulter and warned off Newmarket Heath." In the Court of Appeal it was conceded that the case was covered by the former decision and, as I have said, the present appellant admits that his appeal to this House must fail unless he satisfied us that Hyams v. Stuart King (1) should be overruled.

The real issue in this case is not, therefore, whether there was "a fresh bargain," or whether the respondents gave good consideration for the appellant's agreement to pay in the manner defined in the letters of Aug. 17 and Aug. 20, but whether the payments he thus contracted to make were payments of "a sum of money alleged to be won upon a wager" within the meaning of the second limb of s. 18. The contract sued on is identified in the writ as being the agreement made on Aug. 20, and if it was not so identified details of it could have been obtained by demanding particulars. What, then, is this contract alleged by the respondents on which the suit is brought ? It is a contract to pay what Tattersalls' committee ordered the appellant to pay, though the respondents are giving more time for such payment. But there can be no question that what the committee ordered the appellant to pay was a sum of money won by the respondents from him on wagers as to the result of horse-races. Tattersalls' committee did not profess to have any jurisdiction to deal with any other subject-matter and indeed the respondents' letter of Aug. 17 correctly interprets the letter of Aug. 15, to which it is a reply, as containing the statement " that up to the present you have been unable to comply with the order of Tattersalls' committee." The arrangement, by the very terms of the letter of Aug. 17, is to pay by instalments " the balance of our account " and the account is an account of betting transactions and of nothing else. The first limb of s. 18 does not apply to the case because the contract sued on is not " by way of gaming or wagering " but is a new bargain, but, inasmuch as the new bargain was to pay the betting account, an action brought on it, as it seems to me, is nevertheless brought for recovering sums won by betting.

In opposition to this view of the matter three considerations are urged and I must deal with them in turn. First, it is said that the second limb of the section is mere repetition of the first, and thus, if the action is not defeated under the first limb, it cannot fail under the second. Secondly, this last contention is varied by arguing that the second limb is not entirely tautologous, but is governed by the opening provision which enacts a substantive change in the law by following this up with the corresponding provision relating to procedure. Thirdly, it is suggested that the word " alleged " in the second limb creates a difficulty which shows that the appellant's construction of the section is wrong.

As regards the first of these objections, it is to be observed that though a Parliamentary enactment (like Parliamentary eloquence) is capable of saying the same thing twice over without adding anything to what has already been said once, this repetition in the case of an Act of Parliament is not to be assumed. When the legislature enacts a particular phrase in a statute the presumption is that it is saying something which has not been said immediately before. The rule that a meaning should, if possible, be given to every word in the statute implies that, unless there is good reason to the contrary, the words add something which would not be there if the words were left out. If the choice is between tautology and retrospective effect (as in Hough v. Windus (5)) it is natural to prefer a construction which implies the reproach that Parliament has said the same thing twice over in preference to a construction which would have the result of undeclared retrospective interference, but no difficulty of choice of that sort arises here. Indeed, the proper construction of one section can seldom be assisted by reference to a decision on the construction of quite a different section in another statute. The presumption, therefore, is that the second limb of s. 18 is not coincident in effect with the first limb. It is noteworthy that in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) the report of the argument contains no trace of a submission to this effect and FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., observes ([1908] 2 K.B. 712) :

> " . . . too little attention has been paid to the distinction between the two parts of this enactment, and the second part has been treated as being in effect merely a repetition of the first part."

This is the more striking because the actual facts in that case as set out (ibid., 697) show that the winner of the bet wrote to the loser :

> " ' You promised faithfully that, if I kept quiet and did not injure your > business by telling any of the s.p. men, or take proceedings, you would pay every farthing that was owing '."

The winner went on to reproach the loser for breaking his word, so that the argument would have been a powerful one that it was this debt which the plaintiff was seeking to recover. It appears to me that FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., was entirely justified in saying that the statute was so framed as to defeat an action, though not brought on the original wagering contract, if it was brought on an A alleged new contract to pay a sum won on the wager. SIR GORELL BARNES refers briefly to this contention that the second limb of s. 18 goes further than the first limb, but dismisses it by saying (ibid., 705) :

> " . . . when the nature of the contract, as I have stated it, is considered, the contract does not, in my opinion, fall within the language nor the meaning of the statute." B

What the President meant by " the contract as I have stated it " appears from the previous page where he describes it as one

> " . . . that in consideration that the plaintiff would give the defendants a reasonable time within which to pay the amount which the defendants ought to have paid him on Nov. 4, and would forbear to declare them C defaulters if they paid within that further time, they would pay him on or before the expiration of that time the amount which both parties considered was due to the plaintiff in honour, though not by law."

But it seems to me that the amount which was due to the plaintiff in honour was a sum won on a wager, as FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., proceeded to point out. FARWELL, L.J.'s judgment does not appear to contain any implied reference D to FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J.'s view, and indeed he regards " the gist of the case " as concerned with the question whether threatening to post a defaulter for failure to pay a lost bet could properly be described as blackmail. I should agree that in ordinary circumstances it would not amount to a criminal offence, but that does not touch the point raised in FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J.'s dissenting judgment on which the present appellant relies. What happens in such a case E as this is that by a new contract it is sought to transform an obligation of honour into a legal liability, and the argument against the appellant on this part of the case must be that this transformation turns money which was in the first place won on a wager into something else. But it appears to me that, at any rate on the facts of the present case, it is clear that the sum of money sought to be recovered not only owes its origin to the fact that bets were made but is itself F a sum of money so won. When the long history of our legislation to discourage gaming in this country is considered, it is difficult to suppose that the legislature in 1845 did not realise that the object in view would not be attained merely by enacting that bets could not be recovered as such. The Act of 1845 begins with a preamble reciting that previous legislation had not proved completely effective to prevent the mischiefs arising from this cause. I would accept without further G comment the passage in FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J.'s judgment (ibid., 713) where he says :

> " One cannot read the Gaming Act, 1845, without perceiving that it was a very serious attempt on the part of the legislature to put down wagering, and I decline to think that such an obvious and fatal blot was permitted to exist in it, which would well-nigh neutralise its practical effect, when I H find language used which is perfectly apt to meet the case, and which to my mind can fairly bear no other interpretation than that which would thus render it effective."

As for the second suggested objection, it is enough to say that if all the legislature had wanted to do after providing that contracts by way of wagering should be null and void was to add that, as a matter of procedure, no suit should be brought to enforce them, it would have been quite simple to say so. Instead of this, the second limb of the section is framed in quite different and much wider terms, and, in my opinion, aims at defeating the attempt to recover betting losses by such a device as the present.

Lastly, as to the word "alleged." No difficulty arises in the present case from the use of this word, for the respondents do in terms allege that the sum they seek to recover is claimed under a contract to pay the balance of the A betting account and to satisfy an order of Tattersalls' committee which is concerned with nothing but establishing betting liability. Even if the case was one in which this did not clearly appear from the claim itself, particulars as to the nature of the contract relied on would disclose it. The language of the second limb of the section appears to be apt to cover the case where a plaintiff's declaration was of this nature and would justify the defendant in B meeting the declaration by a demurrer. In modern practice, as soon as the nature of the plaintiff's case is found to fall within the second limb, the procedure would be to seek to strike out the statement of claim and to dismiss the action on the ground that such a claim could not possibly succeed. It may be that if a plaintiff managed to launch an action to recover his winnings on betting without either alleging that this was the nature of his claim or being C compelled to give particulars to disclose it, the truth of the matter could be established by the defendant, though in that event the language of the section is awkward because the defendant's success would depend not on what he alleged, but on what was proved. In any event, I do not see how the suggested difficulty in construing the word "alleged" assists the contention of the present respondents. The view which I adopt involves the overruling of the decision in D Bubb v. Yelverton (6). There LORD ROMILLY, M.R., in the year 1870 held that a bond given by a loser of a bet as security for paying the sum involved could be enforced on the ground that "it was given, not to pay racing debts, but to avoid the consequences of not having paid them." There were special circumstances in that case which may have induced the MASTER OF THE ROLLS to reach his conclusion, but I agree with FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., that the bond E constituted an agreement to pay money won on wagers notwithstanding the new considerations, and is thus unenforceable under the second limb of s. 18. There is an indication in the report of the argument for the loser that this contention was put forward, and it ought to have prevailed. Subsequent cases which essentially depend on following Bubb v. Yelverton (6) must also be regarded as wrongly decided.

F We were referred to dicta to be found in some of the judgments in Varney v. Hickman (3) and in Diggle v. Higgs (4). These two cases arose out of a demand by the plaintiff to recover money which he had deposited with a stakeholder to abide the event in respect of which he had made a bet. In the first case the plaintiff had repudiated the wager before the event was ascertained and it was held that he was entitled to recover the amount as money had and received. G In the later case the plaintiff succeeded even after the event had been decided and the plaintiff had lost his bet, inasmuch as the money was still in the hands of the stakeholder and had not been paid over to the winner. Neither of these cases, therefore, directly involved the portion of s. 18 of the Act of 1845 which prohibits the maintenance of actions for the recovery of money won on any wager, and the decisions turned on the proper application of a later limb of the H section dealing with the recovery of what had been deposited in the hands of a stakeholder, and lay down that the language of that limb does not deprive a party who deposits money with a stakeholder to abide the event of a wager of what PARKE, B., in Martin v. Hewson (7) (a cock-fighting case) calls (10 Exch. 738) a locus poenitentiae. But MAULE, J., in Varney v. Hickman (3) and LORD CAIRNS, L.C., and BRAMWELL, L.J., in Diggle v. Higgs (4) expressed a view as to the interpretation of the second limb of the section on which the present respondents rely. MAULE, J., said (5 C.B. 280):
